"It is in my personal belief that King James the Fifth of this... 'Christenmark', is an in fact a loving anachronism. He would better fit in with the European Age of Absolutism rather the 12,020th year of the Holocene Era. To begin with, his character and way of life mimics that of a feudal liege rather than that of a modern, upstanding leader and, in my eyes, makes him out to be overly obsessed with past traditions and maintaining a decaying status quo. His actual leadership leaves much to be desired, and he has no doubt failed to realise that empires of such a scale are inherently multicultural, multiethnic and multireligious. His enforcement of a singular culture upon his imported Sikh 'warriors' is a mistake and a display of his inability to rule effectively. Furthermore, his Christocentric worldview is detrimental not only to his own self but to his people, and ignoring his status as a damned infidel, he reeks of the typical arrogance and inhumanity I do often see in 'pious' Christians. If he pursued a more modern and amicable path to Iranian interests, I would be most pleased. However, that... Christianisation of core Iranian territories is unforgivable and warrants nothing less than reconquest and reintegration into the Iranian Empire."
