The relative size of the military is small compared to the overall population (active personnel is less than 0.1%), but makes up for it with logistical support and advanced technologies.

In the early modern period Hatsunia adopted a policy of fukanshō (non-interference), which embraced interaction with the outside world but rejected any notion of expansion.

They have backup cities designed to shelter their entire population in case of major disasters, complete with greenhouses, industrial areas, and recycling systems, made for complete sustainability after near-apocalyptic events. They also usually appoint atheists or agnostics to oversee nationwide religious affairs in order to prevent bias, which itself seems rather biased but I guess that's as impartial as you can get when you have a single person in that position.

King Emilio's hatred of capitalism began with his experience under the American school system, more specifically the underfunded facilities, poorly behaved students, and jingoistic attitudes towards the rest of the world. His parents taught him to consider himself an African rather than an American, but they still expected him to become rich and successful under the American system.

There are concerns over who is to be heir to the kingdom, they have 42 legions (which is likely an underestimation of their available manpower, Rome fielded about 30 legion (circa Teutoburg Forest) from a population half the size), and they have pretty map

Ninja'd - Cantelo, their current dynasty stretched back almost 900 years to King Robert de Halloway, 1150. Also they have an insanely efficient economy with a GDP per capita of like 90,000.

The low number of Legions is due to the neighbouring states either being allies or have a far far smaller population making a large army to rival Centrucia unlikely. We do have reserves which will be more dear as I flesh out the NS more.
