Ah yes, haha. I am totally - as a communist nation - very secular and progressive. 🤔

Another cliché: people feel like their nation has to be ultra progressive or ultra conservative. No in between, no being progressive in some ways but conservative in others.

Just choose both extremes, no one likes being a "centerist" (but actually super extremist in disguise).

I suppose that's another cliché: how many nations seem to portray tradition, morality, and religion on one side, and progressivism and secularism on the other. Religion need not be socially traditional, nor secularism necessarily lead to progressive change. Portraying all religious people as one entity and non-religious as another leads to generalisations.

In some respects, this was part of the origins of Baizou: a desire to shake-up typical boundaries and have ideas cross lines that seem to not usually get crossed. Hence Baizou's plurality Catholic population nonetheless consistently votes for the socially-progressive representatives and policies, in some ways thanks to the casuistic legacy of the early church in Baizou. Religion itself is a not-easily-boxed concept in Baizou, as the institutional eparchy and the indigenous Mahouzouhou tradition have maintained their unlikely alliance as "religions." The leaderships of the Liberals and Libertarians are relatively irreligious, but they're not secular progressives so much as neo-Enlightenment hyper-rationalists. The Lotuses and Marxists are interested in "tradition," but also yield to and press for progress respectively. Now, there are also some less disruptive forces in Baizou as well. The New Liberals and Socialists are pretty secular, and they're likewise very socially progressive. The Wakuna Restoration and New Conservatives are all about 'tradition, morals, etc.,' and they are anti-progressive. So there's some clichés and some attempts to reverse clichés. If we were to get speculative about the subconscious mind, I wonder if that was unconsciously part of my interest in videocassettepunk? After all, it's another way to cross seeming boundaries, putting the past together with the future.

I'm leaning more and more towards making Fuso (my sorta friendly neighbourhood Japanese alt w/MagicT) the sort of half conservative half prog (social democratic) mess you'd expect from a Japanese Empire (that doesn't want to die of a TFR of 0.5) in the 21st century tbh. Unfortunately that's what many (including a few of my own RP groups) had to do to avoid one line spam. We wish we could keep it open but it seems random oneliners love to hijack anything that's not closed/invite only

If you do want to get involved in RP groups and such, you can usually TG one of the members, most people won't leave you out if you're a good writer and show effort in your work

Wouldn't it be enough to ban one-lines but keep an RP open to all?

People spam anyways, clutters up the thread even if you fire the ignore cannon. The RP community isn't elitist though, if you put effort into your posts then most groups should be willing to let you in, it's not like everyone started off making 10 paragraph long detailed posts

I think the issue is more finding people to RP with, at least on my end. But maybe I'm just not looking hard enough. Running my own thread intimidates me as well.

Oh, I'd love to test my writing, but all the open and non-one-line RPs I've tried to participate in did not go ahead because the OP did not start (despite a large number of participants) or because he gave up without warning. And, dammit, I even had a private RP nipped in the bud because a nation, who himself had proposed to meet my leader, left the RP after just one post!

When people make middle east nations, they are either war zones or daesh tier caliphates. Sometimes both. Why does nobody do one more along the lines of say, Egypt or Jordan?

to be fair, i'm desensitized with the pomspam now, and i've had no issue with waiting through it. the only issue is the stutter and the cleanup time.

Do I fit the criteria for being both progressive and conservative? My nation protects gay rights but is in a way anti-feminist.

Nature-wise, you are correct.

Language-wise, this video begs to differ: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=rIGJk9JCG38&t>

"Estonian is more innovative, meaning it has more modern grammar. While Finnish is conservative, meaning it uses older grammar."

Anyways, back to clichés, I noticed that you are either straight up communist or full on laissez-faire capitalist, there is no in between.
