Another cliché: chains like this that tend to break out, with some small gradual escalation. Thankfully, these tend to not go too far.

Cliche: this thread's sequel should probably be called "7th World Problems" or something. Or that thread should split off of this one.

The reason why we are not using this for cliches anymore is probably because everything has already been said, and we have all run out of cliches. The cliché-well has dried up. All leaves has fallen out of the cliché-tree. The cliché-jar has no cliché-cookies anymore. The cliché-powered car is empty of gas. The cliché-reservoir is no more.

An absolute classic I sometimes remember from back when I posted on NSG was this anti-trans user who said that trans users on this site should have to put some sort of symbol in their flags so people would know they were trans.

And like this was also at the time when lots of people had ribbons in their flags in support of a fairly well-known user (sorry I can't remember who they were off the top of my head) who I think was fighting cancer at the time (pretty sure they managed to beat it too, so good on them)

But anyways this person thought the people with the flag ribbons were trans users who were already signaling that they were trans and they said something along the lines of 'All trans users should have to put that ribbon on their flags'

Naturally people were just like 'Those ribbons are supporting someone who is fighting fucking cancer'.

(Now if only I could remember if this was the same person as the 'trans people should be forcibly branded with a "T" on their forehead' person lol)

I'm sorry, but why the fuck should trans people signal anything to anyone? Like why did that person think that trans people owe anything to them.

Trans men tend to be less visible in general

yup why do you think almost all of the anti-trans bigotry is almost entirely focused on 'they want to turn boys into GIRLS!!!' because they think trans men don't exist (or they just think they're butch lesbians)

As I said elsewhere, even conservative trans people (by name, Blaire White) either forget or intentionally disregard the existence of trans men.
