A lot of NSGers, Gameplayers, or WAers using their nations almost solely for those purposes, with little to nothing in the worldbuilding, factbooks, or RP

Nothing wrong with that per say, your choice what to do with your nation, but a lot of these people have never even stepped into the foray of worldbuilding which I feel is missing out on a big part of NS

I have never really participated much outside of a few RPs in international incidents and Forum 7.

One of my favorite aspects tied in pretty closely with the world building: factbook formatting. I've seen some NSGers and Gameplayers with factbooks, Me being one of them. But by far the most reserved people I've ever seen are the WAers. It almost seems like their entire time on this game revolves around the WA. I RP a lot, and have never seen a WAer in one. It's really weird.

There are a lot of world superpower nations, so there's that.

I think WF could be called pseudo-democratic because it has an elected Parliament, although it spends most of its time fighting, and it also has a hereditary monarchy. So 'tis a mix of both.

I've written Dayganistan to be a pseudo democracy that at some levels legitimately does work, but at the executive level you're getting into oligarchy, vote rigging and nepotism.

Republic of Dayganistan

A secular, Tajik dominated state in Central Asia which has experienced 40 years of democratic backsliding. NS stats are NOT used.

Speaking of the World Assembly, I'll never understand why quite a few WA participants seem to get so mad when other nations talk about ignoring WA resolutions. I get that 'canonically', if you're part of the World Assembly, your nation's laws are modified to match WA law and all and you are obligated to abide by them, but governments in the real world ignore international law and even their own national laws all the time! So what makes the WA so special that doing the same is considered poor form then?

This is just me personally, and obviously not all WAers are like this, but the WA community has always seemed like the rudest and saltiest out of the communities. I've encountered some nice ones, like Tsaivao, who actually gave me ways to fix stuff instead of just pointing out how it was wrong in the sharkiest way possible, but most of them are just such goddamn assholes. It's the reason why I gave up WAing after one proposal draft, which I submitted early because I was sick of the community.

That's literally half of Nomia-329H, since Noissons are crappy at emulating democracies (the only nations that are democracies, Honmore and Savroyska are flawed democracies)

On the topic of that, flawed democracies are much rarer than supremely ideal chungus keanu democracies.

I think part of the issue is that lots of NSGers and WAs are primarily attached to nations that are essentially just their political fantasies and that's much less exciting to worldbuild on. Alcala-Cordel's a perfect example, I put a lot of effort into formatting things but my world is hardly developed and its figurehead is a caricature of a self-insert.

Maybe I should go down another layer and make a caricature of Alcala-Cordel that makes light of it and myself in a slightly self-depracating way, I could develop that.
