NS Cliché if it hasn't been brought up before: a developed country that got overthrown in a socialist revolution and turn into a socialist state.

Going off of that a bit, and something I'm somewhat guilty of myself, randomly having a revolution or massive political upheaval for no reason whatsoever, maybe a paragraph explaining how the population all of a sudden got "redpilled" or something. Every revolution in history has a catalyst, lost wars, economic collapse, a radically unpopular decision, etc.

I usually consider their offer, I'm just collecting cards to make my International Artwork stat go higher, so if they're going to do a decent offer it doesn't worry me.

does "having a bunch of ideas you want to write down, but then you get to writing and you realize you're actually writing pathetically little and even though you're almost finished, you've not put in enough filler to make it substantial" count?

So true! If I had the time I would also just make unlimited dispatches nobody would read.

On that, new cliché time:

People who make factbooks about everything, even if the entire topic only amounts to a sentence or two.

Ok so the reason why I decided to just rework everything, and create a hub-factbook is because I thought that my factbook list looked like a mess. I decided that I wanted to have a bit more organization. Also, if you have a hub-factbook, then everyone thinks you're smarter than you actually are.

Ok, so how often does it happen that you look at an old factbook of yours, and you think that it looks kinda crappy, so you decide to rework it. But now another factbook looks crappy in comparison, so you rework it too. You've been infected with rework-tythus, and now you can't stop reworking factbooks.

Depending on how you make it, it can be pretty creative tbh. Another cliché, and I am entirely guilty of this one, is to make your factbooks look basically like Wikipedia but in NS format, to make it look "professional".

also here's another one: people pretending to be "good posters" who make "informed replies" without actually engaging with people's content so they write decently lengthy and well-worded responses consisting of the most generic surface-level bs commentary they can manage to spit out. sometimes they take note of certain basic features being present (i.e. "there's a long and expansive history section", "there's a lot of info on culture") just to add to the larp but it's still obvious bc there's nothing even remotely specific about the content that's actually there.
