Not really a bad cliché per se, but a nation archetype I've noticed is "Western Europeans but in an exotic location."

There are quite a few nations that take place in Africa, Asia, etc that are majority-white that, in the OTL, are some other race. Not to say that examples of that don't exist (America, Canada, Australia, etc), but I found it kinda common enough to point out. ~~Though typically those nations brush off the "How they got there" part.~~

One interesting subversion of that trope that I really enjoy is British/French monarchy in all but name except the population is black or some other shade of non-white. I've seen two or three nations do it, plus the people behind them were usually halfway decent RPer by NS standards. It probably has the advantage of familiarity as well given most NSers come from the Americas, Europe, or Oceania/Australia.

au contraire; doing something based off of IRL is probably the biggest cliché in NS, as a lot - a LOT - of people do it.

They're also neoliberal democracies with customs and economics that are suspiciously foreign and whose governments are basically either 1) extremely nationalist and anti-Western to the point of comedy or 2) basically Euro-American/NATO puppets that oppose (choose one of: Russia, China, North Korea, Iran, Syria.) If you're going to go that far, you might as well just create a European empire anyways. Is it too much for me to want a nation where Iran, Ecuador, or Indonesia is portrayed semi-realistically and positively?

Criticising the corporate duopoly's [blue/red] party? Sounds like we have an imposter among us. Off to [Californian gulags/Texas gulags] with you!

Now that I think of it, I was planning to use magic to remove surplus value's existence, which might have made it a socialist-leaning nation anyways. But acknowledging the existence of magic is also anti-materialist...

I never created a mechanism by which this "magical-utopian-capitalist" would remove surplus value using magic, but private property still exists so I would still call it capitalism, albeit in a form I would accept with some reservation.

These episodes have been getting more and more intense, but the overall plot has been trending darker and darker. Am I the only one who thinks they won't be able to give us a good ending realistically?

I miss the Great War series. They even made a cool miniseries sequel to make it so this Hitler guy who fought in it (in the Great War he was a minor character who nearly died and became obscure afterward) become leader of Germany through political intrigue and German political factions in the Weimar political games. Don't make shows like they used to, I'm telling you.

The current seasons are just boring remakes of Cold War episodes with China instead of the USSR, though North Korea is a pretty good comic relief I guess. Maybe the resource depletion will restart the franchise and give us new content. Just hope the nukes subplot gets finished too.

they had some potential for a good end with that scythia plotline, i think, but it's been such a long-running show it's hard to get all the seasons to stick together.

Not sure if this cliché is common, but nations rebooting leaders or just their entire nation in general. It's not a bad cliché after all some people don't like how their work turned out, so now they're rebooting it. I did this once with Quinn since I didn't enjoy her last backstory and now I'm rebooting this nation

Another cliché is the laziness of creating plausible figures, such as "How many people in your population have access to the internet?"

"100%"

Or, looking at the Drongonia indices, "How many crimes occur in your country in a year?"

"1 or 2"

I mean, not even in the most utopian societies can a crime rate be that low. Unless you have some kind of Big Brother in the house.

I mean dystopian nations aren't quite at that degree of extreme brutality, unless they're somewhat unrealistic or unsustainable. Honestly crime in general more arises from poverty, which would be the real source of crime in said dystopian nations (as, hey, what's a dystopia without people clutching at life in the extreme throes of poverty?)
