"Quite a few transophonts around here lately. And this one seems to fit right into that age-old 'assimilate everyone, grow endlessly' archetype... which baffles me, to be honest. Forceful assimilation-blobbing has a staggeringly high likelihood of ending in the mother of all coalition wars, and the sheer risk associated with such isn't something I see a lot of these constructs considering. For all their touted processing power, they neglect basic narrative causality. As for this one in particular? It is of little interest, to be frank. Its ambitions are far too small-scale, far too restrictive. It seeks advancement, yes, but only for the purpose of expanding an ultimately meaningless empire-state. A respectable chunk of potential computing banks which could be used with oh so much more efficacy when set to a more productive task... but I, unlike this Paramount, have at least some inkling of the overreaching concept of investment versus gain. And really, the potential gains from subsuming its processing structure would by no means warrant the time and effort lost in so doing."

After all, driving one's parents to a suicide is considered a masterful and beautiful act among all monarchs, and if someone says otherwise... well, then he is an incompetent dirty commoner, who doesn't even know how to read. "The entity that identifies itself as the 'The First King of Corpses' is decidedly unusual. We have observed that it possesses capabilities beyond anything we have thus far encountered in our explorations, and was apparently once human. We note that this appears to be a trend, although the capabilities of this entity are distinct from the one that we have previously observed. Further observation will prove necessary to properly assess the entity's capabilities for detailed analysis."

AN:

"The entity that identifies itself as the 'Paramount' is much more familiar to us, being a machine intelligence in a similar, albeit far more limited, vein as ourselves. Interestingly, it appears that he does not possess a proper artificial mind, but is instead an amalgamation of various organic minds into one construct, a procedure that while not unknown to us, is not one we consider to be particularly viable in producing useful constructs. The goals of this entity are of some interest, although it should be warned that absorbing all other intelligences into a single collective mind tends to make things very boring."
