Usually not a crime unless you get drunk. In that case, you'd get some light fines (up to $200 max) for public intoxication.

The person could be prosecuted for grievous bodily harm in this situation.

However, whether to be punished whether by imprisonment or some other means would very much depend on what goes down in court. The arguments of the lawyers would be decisive in this type of case. If he was convicted of grievous bodily harm, his sentence could be a sentence of prison of 5 to 10 years.

Until a few years ago it was seen only as a criminal misdemeanor, however, after a series of social appeals from the populations of the capitals and metropolitan areas of Merulla who were bothered by the bad smell and infestations of rats, cockroaches and other urban pests, a new law was ratified transforming the misdemeanor into a crime in itself.

Therefore, the practice of urinating, defecating or vomiting on public roads is punishable by imprisonment from 6 months to 1 year.

Money laundering

50,000 Glombit fine. 1 year working as laborer in a prison laundry. And serving sentence for whatever crime the money was being laundered for. Maybe 1-5 years.

Erm... that's unusual... impersonating an officer or trooper of the Gendarmerie Nationale, or La Garde Prétorienne, so it depends. life in prison if it's a Gendarme, thrown into a pit of Inland taipan (Oxyuranus microlepidotus) naked.

Usually the government is in charge of building roads, but citizens can build them too, as long as they are volunteering or if it's on private property. However, seeing that this is on disputed land, we would probably issue mild fines for this (up to $500 at the absolute maximum).

The penalty vary from state to state. If someone break the vase in Amipu, the referred person will be sent to prison for 5 years and pay your house as debt. But if this act was made in Bonzig or Dabaw, the referred person will pay the vase value as fine.
