seriously though, why do people seem forget the vast majority of (post-WW1, and arguably even before that) military stuff isn't the actual fighting, but is rather supplying the fight? I get describing how big gun go pow is more fun than the complex system of logistics needed to make sure that the big gun is maintained, armed, bureaucratically approved, moved around, etc., but come aaaaaan.

/rant though.

Because coordinating logistics and maintaining long lines of supplies involve a lot of effort to do, and no one here is gonna stay up from 9:00 to 2:00 in the morning writing down every detail and information, fitting all of it into every nook and cranny into a single factbook on how their military continues to fight thanks to its logistics system.

is "people exaggerating their struggles and problems in this thread by taking some incident that occurred exactly once or twice and dragging it out into a tale of woe talking about how everyone around me is definitely doing X! yes, it's only happened once or twice, but if I extrapolate other issues that I'm having and pseudo-connect them back to my main issue then technically literally everyone is wronging me!" a cliché yet?

these "struggles" generally fall into a couple categories:

- people who feel like one person saying bad things about their ideas, tastes in entertainment, writing abilities, etc clearly shows that everyone who isn't a fervent believer in what they like or believe in is out to make them look bad or make fun of them and hates their guts.

- people who have impractical ideas on things feeling the desperate need to defend themselves even if their ideas cause more trouble for them than not

- people who constantly interject themselves or their characters into the conversation when literally anything even slightly relevant comes up. I'm not talking about the people who just say "X character of mine is like this." no, I'm talking about the people with whom you could use the word "synergy" and then they would come sprinting in and say that "well, my character used the word "grey" once, which is a partial anagram for synergy, and therefore this must be a reference to my character, right! let me tell you about his involvement in X RP and Y read only story that illustrates this conflict he's been having that's entirely unrelated to this conversation."

there's definitely more variants, but these are the 3 i notice most often.

Chances are, if you're making more than 5 factbooks for your military stuff, then you're really overdoing it to the point of ludicrousness. However, if you can make them intuitive to read by using integrated links and making the factbooks look nice and read with an organic flow, then I don't care if you have 50 trillion factbooks because they've all been included neatly alongside one another from a useful hub (which should act as a hook so people are actually interested in reading it instead of seeing the generic NS factbook screen and being put off by a lack of effort in tying them together). I can think of Synne as an example where there are an absolute shitton of military related factbooks, but a lot are pretty easily accessible through his hubs and are actually well put together which makes them both easy to access and good to look at.

Just don't be upset if people don't read all your factbooks if you have too many of them, it becomes boring if the factbooks are just generic military information with hardly any formatting. I mean my military factbooks are pretty shit though so I'm not exactly a leading authority here.

Because my dear friend, "big gun go pow" is what most people focus on. Instead of the tiny little details that actually make victories.

And because they don't have a burning fetish for fantasizing about how Germany could've been sissified through a LONG and HARD aerial campaign targeting Petrol-Oil-Lubricant manufacturing. Nor are they obsessive enough to mention things like how AA duty could divert cannons/ammunition from land. Or how copper shortages affect artillery's effectiveness in wars determined by artillery.

Granted, gassing/infecting German horses would be an EZ-PZ victory, but that's not what the morally superior good guys do.
