Ecoterrorism Gang

This post is a joke. I do not actually endorse ecoterrorism.

Salted nukes follow the idea of "salting the earth" where in ancient times Romans would put salt into the soil so nothing could possibly grow from once-fertile lands ever again.

Salted nukes however are more drastic, being known as "cobalt bombs" given that they rely on producing as much radioactive byproduct as possible that will also last as long as possible as well. This "salts" the earth, rendering areas uninhabitable for extended periods of time, along with wreaking havoc upon the ecosystem.

"Dirty" bombs do this to a lesser extent. While a bomb is typically meant to kill through either sheer explosive force, fragments, or both (ignoring more specialized types like bunker busters) a "dirty" bomb adds radiation to the equation. When employed, a dirty bomb can contaminate an area with radioactive products despite using a conventional explosive, enabling the one deploying it to bypass the costs and difficulties of producing a nuclear weapon while also having the capacity to spread fear and injury over time through exposure to radiation and, to a much lesser extent, the more immediate effects from the blast and possible fragments.

In short, it's the ultimate terror weapon, even if it's a step down from an actual nuke, but a step above chemical agents and to some extent a biological weapon.

Is 'people not knowing realistic military sizes' still a thing? Cause I remember back in the day it wasn't uncommon for people to have in their factbooks something like 'Our nation's population is 50 million and we have 10 million people in the army' (and of course they'd use army as a synonym for 'military').

Oh I was guilty of that, considering I seem to barely have any sense of scale. An older version of my military factbook saw my Karazi Arma (which I referred to as Armastasi before renaming it to separate it from East German crap) armed with ridiculous amounts of artillery, with shit like 200,000 mortars, 15,000 rocket trucks, and whatnot for the sake of "Artiljerija!"

Somewhat related, people cramming shit loads of people into a given space of land whose size probably wouldn't be able to sustain their presence. Like, a nation with 50 million people crammed onto a small island? Doubt they'd be a thing for long.

You ever hear of neutron bombs? They're low-yield bombs with an enhanced radiation payload, designed to disable personnel and equipment while leaving infrastructure relative intact. We even fielded some for a while in the 1980s.

There was some controversy as to whether they were any good against tanks, or not. Supposedly they could cause the depleted uranium layer in some composite armours to emit fission products that would cook the tank crew. Not a pretty way to go.

Despite the awesomeness of the concept a bunch of Euro-peaceniks said "no" so they were never deployed in Europe, which defeated the point. this is a joke...

I think it's pretty much always going to be the same. People also don't understand the societal militarization or perception of the military that would be required to sustain armed forces hundreds of thousands to millions of people in size.

Part of the reason why Red Lake's army is so big is because of conscription, and part of it is because the military is perceived with almost America levels of reverence, due to... well, everything going on in this fucked up little place I made lmao

The fact that they're also used as a police force in cases of extreme emergency (such as the devil cult incident a few weeks ago) doesn't hurt their reputation, either...

What do you mean using 40 million hypersonic "Fuck You" missiles on a speedboat that had like 5 dirt-poor pirates aboard is unrealistic?

Also, speaking of weapons, this is a cliché I notice A LOT; Arms Manufacturing canonically being a cornerstone of a country's economy. Some people do it cuz it's funny, others cuz "hurrdurr military cool", but like. The volume of weaponry an (average) nation would have to churn out and supply annually for arms manufacturing to be a central part of the economy would be so insane I don't think anyone comprehends it.

Fairly certain the arms manufacturing thing is because some people try and incorporate NSstats into their lore early on and just forget to tweak it to be more realistic later on. Either way arms manufacturing itself would never even be the primary sector of the economy given that it is a subsector of heavy industrial production.

Yes although it's moved more towards "my country of 500,000,000 with a professional army size of 2,000,000 (large but still within the bounds) just bombed an entire continent with 50 trillion dollars worth of equipment like it was nothing"

What do you mean using 40 million hypersonic "Fuck You" missiles on a speedboat that had like 5 dirt-poor pirates aboard is unrealistic?

Also, speaking of weapons, this is a cliché I notice A LOT; Arms Manufacturing canonically being a cornerstone of a country's economy. Some people do it cuz it's funny, others cuz "hurrdurr military cool", but like. The volume of weaponry an (average) nation would have to churn out and supply annually for arms manufacturing to be a central part of the economy would be so insane I don't think anyone comprehends it.

Those pirates deserved it.

Come out, the WA has passed a resolution. Actions will be taken to bring your nation into compliance.
