I tend to touch up my personal photos a bit in .pdn anyways (once I get back home and to my computer in a couple of days I will give you an example with a photo from my vacation) since my phone camera is crap and the color needs a bit of enhancement to not look over/underexposed, so it's more convenient to finagle it this way. At least for me.

maybe if I go to work at mcdonalds, they won't bother to check. but if I want to work at, say, lockheed martin, they will check my social media accounts. 70% of employers screen their candidates' social media presence. it's not a matter of if it happens, it's a matter of when.

I work in the Russian Lockheed-Martin "counterpart" (at least we're trying to be one) and the state security didn't give a fuck about my political views. Like I've had a literal Strasserist Asuka avatar back then and no one cared.

This is not the case in the West, suffice to say. Russia is notoriously lax in that area. Also, it's possible for people to harass you irl if they come into possession of your personally identifying information, hence why it's considered proper to keep it to yourself.

because... identity theft (and fraud) is a very real thing that can genuinely ruin one's life? this is probably the main reason most of us are pretty careful when dealing with pretty personal info on the internet. like, at least in my case, I don't care if you know what city I live in, since it's not something that could really be used against me by itself. however, what I do care about is that, using what little info I may have given to you (which doesn't necessarily have to be all that compromising by itself), you've managed to piece together enough details about me to be able to ruin my, say, current economic situation.

It's less that the government is invasive or that those opinions are illegal and more that the companies hiring people don't want "X COMPANY HIRES LITERAL FASCISTS THEY ARE ACTUAL NAZIS" smattered all over social media. What trouble would it make if you'd know my RL address and name? It's not like I'm giving you my passport numbers or something which CAN and WERE used to ruin people's lives by acquiring a shitload of credits and debts on their behalf. And it's not like we have things like social security numbers here too. Consider moving to Russia, where we're too technologically backwards so that identity theft becomes harder! Тотал протектион!

As long as you don't hire/support feminists, gay people or other libleft you're going to be fine. However, supporting Navalny or the opposition may REALLY get you into trouble but eh that's your usual state security and shit. Like if I were to Sieg Heil in the middle of my workplace (we have a relatively large territory with even a park) I would get into trouble, but as long as I don't show it no one cares. And if someone were to find my profile (which is not hidden at all) and post shit like "OMFG RUSSIAN PLANES ARE DESIGNED BY BLACK NAZIS" the worst thing that will happen is that everyone will have a good laugh and carry on.

I can think of a few

I could search up your name on databases and find your employers, contacting them about how you committed acts of larceny. I could send your address to shady companies, filling your mailbox with spam ranging from Nigerian Prince schemes to blackmail. I could use the full name and address to pinpoint your email address and sign you up for things ranging from fake club penguin accounts to pornography websites. I could set up credit cards in your name, causing the bill to be footed to you. Alternatively, I could give your address and full name to a criminal/criminal organization. I could use your full name and address while doing illegal things on the internet, giving police a tip that "you're" the guy who tried to hack Jeff Bezos' bank account - not actually myself.

These are all examples, I would not actually do any of the actions, but on this god-forsaken site, someone else probably would.

As I've said before, I have my doubts that my employer would even care about what you tell them. It's Sukhoi and they couldn't care less about unproved (and no, photoshopping won't work because photoshopping is a thing they often do and know how to do) claims about their employees. Moreover that that in order to sign up for most things you need to also know my e-mail password which I'm not giving away. I receive shit ton of spam every day and don't care as I just simply sort the incoming messages by sender and I know when someone sends me something valuable via e-mail. Finally, what makes you think that criminal organizations would care to do anything to me? It's not like they go around bashing random people's heads just cause

Yeah, uh... we don't have that latter thing, mate. Nor is allowing minorities the right to exist something frowned on in our country, and all things considered I'd rather be in a nation that considers hiring fascists a faux pas than one that considers gay people inherently evil.

Allowing the minorities the right to exist isn't frowned in Russia... I mean it's not something that even I frown on- not gonna elaborate further because that'll just send the discussion down the drain.

About gay people that part is completely true. Like most of my coworkers hate them WAY more than me. Even by my standards they're often going overboard with this
