North German Realmwrote:

The people of North America, employing Council Communism and Workplace Democracy, are said to only work 15 hours a week. (Which either means there's too many workers or too few jobs.)

I guess? In modern, capitalist society, a considerable degree of labor is devoted to things such as advertising, which would have no place in a socialist society. In addition, enormous amounts of labor are wasted by different companies racing to develop the same technology. Greatly decreased labor time in a post-capitalist society isn't a flaw, it's by design.

They evidently have a smaller definition of "metro area" than the U.S. census does, since they put the New York metro area at 11 million people while the census puts it at 20 million.

Under the leadership of Pan Cheng, many previously privatized industries were re-nationalized in an attempt to reverse the Deng-esque red neoliberalism of his predecessors.

The Six Pillars of Total Defence is actually somewhat interesting, and I personally consider Civil Defence the most important pillar. The Civil Defence calls for the nation to uphold its culture, promotes its ideals, and keep the citizens happy to support any war.

Upon realizing the catastrophic events of Chernobyl, the governments of Ukraine, Belarus, and Russia began to seal up the area and forbid access to the area, which left the people (or monsters) affected by the radiation trapped within the city.

They failed in uniting all of Germany, and thus created a German Cold War with their southern counterparts. Also Austria in this timeline is far more competent in maintaining and stabilising its German territory, rather than forcing millions of non Germans into its ranks.

Actually, Inklings turned the tide of World War I. Inkopolitia was isolationist at the time that World War 2 hit, because of the fact that Inkopolis was attacked and a coup d'etat was attempted by the Germans, shortly before Inkopolitia joined WW1.
