The Global Assembly began as a response for thee planet to have a general authority and globalisation. It was also created as a compromise response to a war involving 17 nations. These 17 would later make up this assembly. However, due to the disagreements and lack of maintaining it, it eventually ceased as an organization with the start of the Global War.

In 1961, an Independent Science Reform was enacted in their nation which consists of many acts. Though, there was already precedent with the Minerva Corp. v. Wallman decision, the act was made as a safeguard. There are major 3 acts: The Scientific Papers Copyright Act, The Science Tax Act, and the the National Academy of Sciences Independence Act.

The OP really likes anime. By an 'overkill' amount. Like things that didn't need to even be in certain factbooks are there because there's an animated version of it.

What if Svalbard was a Nazi fortress used by the Americans and Soviets as a means to backstab the other while not giving two shits about taking the island because honestly a snowy place full of booby traps isn't worth it but the Nazis there still really hate the Allies and the Allies hate them too but in reality they don't so they just sort of coexist in tense peace while the people of Svalbard are confused and scared and cold but some "nice" people send them care packages with food and other stuff?

"Gryreling", a term pretty much the equivalent for "Xeno" when used as a derogatory way to refer to an alien, basically means "horrifying creature". I'm not entirely sure why literally all of the Galaxy, the fallen Empires included, didn't band together to put down the threat that rabid humans calling everyone else this present.

The AN is not a human nation, like I was expecting, but primarily consists of a variety of different species. It's nice to see FT nations like this, though I do wonder where humans are in their universe.

The capital of the remulian empire is the planet Remulia, which is 2.3 times the size of the earth, and home to 10 billion. From the looks of the photo, it is also telluric, with several oceans, and appears breathable.

In their timeline, Great Britain -as we know it, the geographical term- didn't really exist and what is now Scotland is in turn a shattered island -an archipelago- north of England.

Despite being an Interstellar State divided into seven sectors, with a population exceeding 90 billion, somehow democracy manages to semi-insert itself.

Democracy isn't really existent here -the "election" is more of an appointing council- but devolution -and with it, public decision making- becomes inevitable when your regions are entire light-years apart. /skip

They're basically Nazi Germany's colony, but now somehow have become Nazi Germany because the homeland was steamrolled by the allies so this remote, frozen wasteland that used to belong to Norway is the last vestige of the once mighty Nazi Germany. Also, the population is quite high considering Svalbard was uninhabited during WW2.

Actually, prior to the evacuation, Svalbard had a population of roughly 3,000. We undercut that by a lot.

Just like in our timeline, Hatsunia has devised the Kyoto Mankyoku Protocol in 1997 to fight global warming through reduction of greenhouse gases emission. Unlike Japan, Hatsunia is strongly opposed to whaling and dolphin hunting, and such activities are illegal.

Dukin Donuts exists in an alternate timeline in which major collision between satellites effectively created a "junkyard ring" around the planet Earth. Technology is noticeably more advanced there as underwater cities, floating cities and even permanent settlements on asteroids is not just possible but something that exists in early 21st century. A Private Donut shop has the sort of resources to ponder over whether it's worth building a permanent settlement on the moon also.

What if America was founded by a girl who likes trees and science, doesn't enjoy war and murdering natives, worships nature, has its kids play a quiz game... based on knowledge and logic (aren't all quiz games tho? sorry my brain is too small for this), and is overall better but somehow hella worse at the same time (this last one is personal opinion)?
