Speaking of FT and space, I have one: large space nations involving tens if not hundreds of star systems.

I'm surprised I've seen very little of this concept, but I really don't think this is likely. Distance and the time it takes to travel is a really, really, really big factor in everything related to interstellar spread, especially since colonizable planets aren't actually that common. Even at a velocity near the speed of light, it'll still take hundreds of years for things to travel. And we went from feudalism to AI in just a few hundred years.

So yeah, it'll be very interesting to see something that takes this concept into heart. A society with this amount of separation should develop in a vastly different way than the usual space states.

Adding all of those factors into play, it will make an interesting scenario. More of a good one, honestly, than one without those factors. Or something about immersion, I don't know.

Yes, I did immerse myself in a shower. Boiling hot water, to be exact.

I could hypothetically give a much more educated opinion on this, and broader FT nations and concepts as a whole, but both my interest and knowledge in that department is dryer than the Atacama.

To be honest, at that point, it would be questionable if a thing that could be called a "state" could even arise. Even during the age of sail, it only took a few months at most for information, goods, and people to get to certain parts of the world - and even with that level of communication, it still allowed distinct cultures and nations to separate from their colonizers (America, Australia, Canada, New Zealand, etc.) If it takes 13,000 years for a human to get from the Sol System to (say) the planet OGLE-2014-BLG-0124Lb - by the point the human gets there (or likely their descendants) tells Earth that they made it and Earth congratulates them - the colonizers might be entirely different species evolved to adapt to their planetary climate.

So I am not disagreeing, but I understand why most people wouldn't want to try to deal with the political climate of planets that can't rely on each other, writing about how upwards of hundreds of planets deviate from mainstream humanity culturally and perhaps biologically, with a dash of existentialism over the future of the human race. Though if someone would like to take up that challenge, I would support them the whole way through.

Same thing happens for the tests of political values. Especially with regard to the monarchies: "most of the results do not coincide with my character", then go and see and notice that economic values are tending towards socialism and political values are libertarian. Thank the hell, how do you expect "absolute monarchy" to come out if you don't have a minimum of authoritarianism or you don't favor capitalism?

Or the opposite: they are classified as Nazis or fascists and complain about it; their nationalist and ethnic values reach almost one hundred percent. You obviously haven't fully understood the questions you answered or the ideology your character belongs to.

Sometimes people are not very subtle when it comes to writing the opposition party like, "Liberal Party are unpopular idiots" or "Conservative Party are unpopular idiots". I mean, they didn't write it exactly like that, but very often I do see their leader's approval rating being higher than their rivals, including their political parties; the leader is re-elected more than twice because of their popularity with the public while the other person is just a scapegoat or something along those lines.

I think it's mainly because people find it fun to have other people debating in the forums about what candidate they should pick, instead of just sorta writing the debates yourself?

Yes.

Another mildly related cliché:

Attempting to hijack a peaceful roleplay thread via political pressure ICly with no valid reasoning short of mere spite...

To explain:

Basically walking into a summit or a dinner as a leader of let's just say Anycountrystan, then rudely declaring the host, Republicistan, as an enemy of humanity before holding the whole event hostage with a big red button until the host changes their ideals to suit Anycountrystan's interests... Or allows them to stomp all over said host country.

Or anything to that degree of insanity and escalation.

tbh, same. I really hate it when the pointless discussions like that "US Destroyer vs 3 Russian aircraft" float up onto there, because I know full well that it's going to devolve into something awful, along with being a very effective way to reduce a person's overall intelligence.

At least, it feels that way anyways.

Most of it is due to these forums not being dedicated to such hypotheticals, plus the fact that such hypotheticals are so off and at times forced that it leaves one questioning if the OP is trying to force a certain collective and agreed-upon outcome in spite of asking for a debate.

It's becoming prevalent, yes, but I wouldn't consider it a cliché yet. When has this begun to occur? If it wasn't in the last month that we've all collectively seen those confusing thread titles, then it could be considered a cliché due to the fact that it's become a common, overused occurrence. If it's only in the past few days, then it realistically could still be considered a cliché, albeit not enough time has passed, along with not enough instances of that having occurred. Is it easy to recognize if it's a cliché or not? Depends on how prevalent it is.

TL;DR: I don't know. Up to you and time to decide.
