As for the former you genuinely see so much (at least on F7) that its really become the norm and any nation which isn't some major economic, scientific, diplomatic, or militaristic leader or is in some other way holding 'superpower status' in the scope of their universe feels like an outlier in threads. I feel like this stems from the inherent difficulty for those without prior worldbuilding experience to create a 'balanced' nation and pushed-on by an inherent desire to 'make the nation as good as possible' as if the writer themselves were in charge of running it, from there it's in many cases just gravitation towards this utopian extreme until the nation is somehow pristine and flawless in every conceivable way. As much as I dislike using the term 'Mary Sue' I can see some of the parallels you could draw between those sorts of characters and these sorts of nations with the nation more or less acting as a self-insert of one's ideals rather than oneself directly. I don't want to get into the mess of politics and the specifics of such but many times these nations are very ideology-centric and are built around assumptions part of whichever ideology or ideologies the nation may generally subscribe to. People with conflicting beliefs may point this out, the writer sometimes butts-back, arguments break out. You've likely seen it before, I know I have. Really only typed this out as an attempt to remind people that I still visit this website but I guess this is my take in the thread now.

May as well piggyback off of what I've already said to comment on this as well. I am hardly an authority on how to write characters well but I personally do have some connection with trying to mirror parts of myself in my various skeletally-completed attempts at characters in the past, mainly in relation to less important perceptions of certain parts of living rather than any major life-driving beliefs and such. I'm no good at writing people because I've never really invested much into understanding how other people function and think. The person whose inner functioning and thought processes I feel like I understand the most is well, myself, and I really don't have any other good sources from personal experience to draw from. This is helpful in situations when you have to work out certain reactions or whatnot but as Kiu has already mentioned, this can very much be a double-edged sword. Once again reminding that I'm by no means experienced in how to establish and utilize characters in writing, I feel as if it's better to treat your characters as puppets or tools, looking at things from as an objective standpoint as possible and then taking into account what the character will think say, or do as themselves rather than directly viewing the situation from the character's perspective through your own lens. "What would [character] think/say/do" turning into "What would I think/say/do" can lead to quite a lot of pitfalls.

While I'm at it, here's my attempt at plugging my own niche interests. You know what I honestly never see outside of GE&T and the big FaNI milthreads? Homebrew PT fighter aircraft. Of course this probably extends to

There are always going to be aspects of my protagonists that are bits of my personality, but I do try to make them their own people. Take Alastair, for instance. I clearly am not royal, nor do I have a law degree--and I certainly do not have firsthand or secondhand experience with alcoholism (which is why I kind of have to be careful writing him). But I did make him ~~and my entire nation~~ obsessed with Hamlet. Character writing, for me, is getting inside the character's head--who they are, how they speak/think, how advanced their vocabulary is. (Okay, almost all of my characters virtually sound the same. It's fine. This is fine. Everything's fine.) So it's almost like I'm mind-reading while I'm developing them. I do grow emotionally attached to my characters, with Alastair being a prime example, and even though I don't necessarily draw from experience, I do sometimes look things up on le Internet when need be. Although my characters can be romanticized (maybe not necessarily the WFian leaders), they're hopefully realistic in their own right. And they're usually not the most mentally stable.

On the topic of superpowers in our NS lore, I try to make the superpowers in my universe to either:

- a) have an extremely crippling, pervasive issue involving government corruption or legislatures being prone to deadlocks
- b) recently recovered from a major civil war or was invaded by a foreign power
- c) ethnic tensions hitting a fever pitch
- d) be on the road to a economic, demographic or political crisis
- e) radicalization of certain sectors of the population
- f) a "deep state" being de-facto in charge of most, if not all, government departments, potentially exacerbating the issues described in a, mainly caused by local or foreign mafias buying their way into government or by some sectors of the military
- or g, pure fucking insanity having fucked the nation into oblivion, mainly due to poverty, crime, or whatever new religious movement was created 15 seconds ago by some raging narcissist online who wanted his own personal harem

A lot of the superpowers in my lore, especially in Europe and America, have committed atrocities, collapsed in on themselves, became satellite states of another power, or are slowly decaying, their influence on the international stage waning every passing second, desperately trying to cling on to that power even if it at times requires a jingoistic attitude towards other countries, militarily or not.

I know a lot of people hate doing research and stuff when they make their RPs, and I think "people not knowing anything about the thing they're RPing about" is a cliché at this point. I consider myself the exact opposite, though. I research things too much. I research things to the point that nobody is going to understand or comprehend what I'm saying because it's gotten so obscure that nobody aside from someone who was an expert in the particular topic I'm writing about would be able to understand what the hell is going on. Need proof?

Things I have done to make the OP for my planned RP:

- find a dictionary for a spoken language only used by a couple thousand people
- find and track the orbital path of five different active US surveillance satellites
- learn everything I can possibly know about the geography and climate of an entirely different country that happens to be on the other side of the world
- read about obscure politicians from said country that literally have like five sentences in their Wikipedia article and/or have no Wikipedia article, forcing me to use websites last updated in 1999
- learn everything I can know about the military force of a nation that's literally like a couple hundred volunteers with assault rifles and also has about five sentences in their Wikipedia article
- learn about an obscure defense treaty between said nation and another nation near it, which is literally mentioned as a footnote in some Wikipedia article that hasn't been updated in a solid 2 years

And I still don't understand ORBAT stuff...

sig stuff

it's supposed to be something about a character that's too broken or OP or something, but as you said, it always gets screwed up by people who assume that any character who isn't always doing stupid stuff and making mistakes is too perfect when in reality, most people do not fuck things up all the time, even if they don't fully understand their situation.

it's used by people who like conflict too much and think that a character being good at stuff is an invitation for their hopes and dreams to be crushed by something beyond their control and/or someone who's better than them

There's a certain TV show I watched where lots of fans love to accuse the main character of being a Mary Sue for the horrific crime of...the show focusing heavily on her.

Yes apparently being the main character of a TV show and having the show be focused around you, the main character, makes you a Mary Sue now.

The only way to rectify that is to change her name to Mary Sue and embrace the trope. Or just have the name "Mary Sue" while sucking at everything. We will come full circle! 🤔

If a character needs meaningful flaws to not be a Mary Sue/Gary Stu, and being a Mary Sue is a major character flaw, are Mary Sues then not indeed deep and flawed characters?

Can there be a good Mary Sue character? For example, a character that everyone likes because they're so nice and strong and don't have any major flaws? Most likely not a serious character but nonetheless.

Can a character go in and out of being a Mary Sue? Overcoming all their flaws, then getting new ones, then getting over those, etc

Anyways I really think there's too many boring political spergs on NS like "America but it's ruled by a monarch" or "slightly more left leaning Britain" or whatever

Idk maybe I'm just sick of seeing boring liberal democracies and psychotic utopia/dystopia dictatorships. Like you can find some genuinely interesting ideas and talented writing on NS but god damn I'd there isn't a lot of FFT super empire #57994378 and real nation except for one political or religious change. Like I don't need excellent writing but like a semi-original idea every now and then is nice. Something that I won't forget in 5-10 seconds y'know Though that's probably just stating the obvious I guess

I have to do that often with my nation's history. There is a time (and I am still doing it) whereby the years were picked out of thin air and put into, so often times I found myself asking "... Wait, that didn't happen in 2060. That was 2061..."
