So, anyone else ever see a post made by a user in the forum list and you think 'Oh, it's this person' and then realize it wasn't that person but it was someone else because their nation names are so similar you always get confused when you just see their names?

This might be a super-specific cliché but nations that officially speak English where it is conveniently exactly identical to whatever variety of English is spoken by the user behind the nation.

Slightly guilty, but in my defence:

A wage worker costs less and is worth more for an employer in an industrial society without good labour laws than a slave, and by the time labour codes began giving workers actual rights and protections there was basically no way to restore slavery.

Plus, if you work a slave to death, you have to buy another. There's always more unemployed workers to fill an empty position in an industrial society.

And, perhaps equally importantly, the quality of the goods a slave produces are necessarily going to be lower in quality compared to a worker who's there willingly and because he needs money.

And even more plus, Egyptians were not the ones to always use slaves to build their stuff. I figured this source might be of use and interest if you like reading!

Which is not to say Ancient Egypt didn't have slaves because they actually did. Just that you probably won't get the Great Pyramids done if you kept whipping someone to death. Sure, the workers were tired \(wonders were thirsty work\), but not exactly slaves, in terms of technicality.

EDIT: Supplementary source from Reuters.

In a sense, consider any kind of construction. Would you rather have thousands of slaves that were half-starved and suffering from malnutrition to the work sluggishly, or would you have decently-paid and (somewhat) happy and professional laborers / construction workers doing the job quickly?

Probably not, because some people might ignore the rules (ie, filling out an app and providing an RP sample) and post a one-liner in the IC anyway.

I suppose that's another cliché: how many nations seem to portray tradition, morality, and religion on one side, and progressivism and secularism on the other. Religion need not be socially traditional, nor secularism necessarily lead to progressive change. Portraying all religious people as one entity and non-religious as another leads to generalisations.
