Eh, I guess. I've been on NS for so long it never dawned on me how weird it was. It's probably because it's easier to quickly respond to a forum post than a GHR.

See the problem I have with the zoomer slang (and no I'm not switching to Aikoland for this post) is that some of y'all act like you invented the term 'cringe'. Like I've been watching cringe comps on YouTube for at least the past 10+ year, cringe is a literal real word and not some new slang term. I could also go on about how a lot of zoomer 'surreal humor' is ultimately no different than the 'I AM VERY RANDOM RAWR XD' humor from when I was like 13-14, but that's for another topic. Shit cycles and everyone thinks they invented stuff that's been around for a long time.

Fairly sure that poggers is a fairly new term. It's painful, but it's new at least. Anyway, I think the new thing "zoomer" humour has brought in is ironyposting where you say a bunch of ridiculous shit you don't mean with other people who reciprocate the irony. Obviously this concept isn't new, but it takes on a new form in circles like on NS where people are at least tangentially political.

I kind of get why they do it to be honest. Say when the pornspammer comes around. The moderation forum gets 10 threads reporting the same person. No imagine that but worse because people are pressing the report button without knowing it's already been reported. Could lead to some things sliding under the radar in those kind of situations.

IIRC I read a post by a mod that said that's exactly why there's no report button for users. (Think the same post said the report button is visible to mods, but they specifically use it for when they see some rulebreaking but they're about to go somewhere and don't have time to actually warn/ban the user, so they use the report button so another mod can deal with it)

People on NSG biting obvious bait or responding to genuine loons/irrational ideologues. The hotep popcorn show m is funny though, I gotta admit.

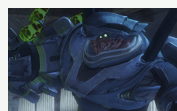

As a rule of thumb, dialogue requires two-way communication. If one isn't interested in hearing the other side, there's no point in acknowledging them.

It ain't "proper" NSG until you see a slew of Ad Hominem flying around like the 4th of July.

Well I once pointed it out, and we eventually agreed that we are just a bunch of bored nerds. Also I do think it's human nature to feel satisfaction from a thorough debunking of opponents, even if it's pointless. From an emotional gratification point of view, it's a mutually beneficial win-win (?)

Not for me though, the high-quality posts are usually quite useful to add to my knowledge bank. It's like the oldest trick in stack forums if no one responds to your question: pretend to be somebody else, give a completely wrong answer, and disagreeing people will come in bulk to overflow you with the information you want.

It's too grating for me, even behind the comfort of internet anonymity. I live in a big city and have no patience for street ranters, so maybe I'm biased.

Fair enough. I learned a lot about details related to Cortes' campaign and primary sources about Conquest battles by lurking on NSG.

I think the main issue is that for a lot of NSG players, especially those with particularly cemented political views, the idea of seeing people with opposing views than them triggers a sort of cognitive dissonance and causes them to outright ignore damning evidence or arguments against them and causes them to "believe what they want to believe." In my opinion, the only thing really keeping NSG together is that the sheer hatred between the opposing sides creates a sense of "I need to prove the other person wrong!" However, this inevitably becomes "I need to prove the other person wrong for myself!" Once this occurs, they will argue anything, be it correct or incorrect, as long as it supports their point. They will try to refute their opponent's points, and even if they get countered, they'll just toss the counter evidence, valid or invalid, to the side. They're only trying to convince themselves that they're right, not anyone else or even the person they're arguing with. They just want to be "proven right" so they can feel smart and accomplished even if that was hardly the case.

However, both sides are like this. Both sides are desperate to get any kind of evidence against the other side, even if it's wrong, misleading, or insubstantial. If they use data to back themselves up, they draw conclusions that may or may not be supported by data. They fail to provide accurate solutions to issues in their plan, or if they do make solutions, those solutions are equally full of holes, and the answers to those are full of holes, and so on. Eventually, when the data and evidence runs dry, they often resort to name-calling and wholly un-political argument and this is the part that requires moderator intervention. Report threads begin to fly and a relationship of hatred builds between sides, whose cognitive dissonance and confirmation bias prevents them from acknowledging that the other side is human and might make some good points at times. That hatred stays around until the next encounter. While the calmer people on each side of the political aisle merely want to disprove the other side to prevent contradictory political opinions from getting in their brain and, god forbid, making some sense, but the sheer bloodlust of some of the NSG players to get people on the other side either banned or warned kicks in and the arguing starts again. More report threads fly, the situation kind of dies down, but sooner or later, the resentment and anger between political sides bubbles over again. Nowadays, the resentment between both sides is so hard that a good 90-95% of report threads are from General. Some are respectful, honest reports against bad, rule breaking players, but quite a few are completely misconstrued quotes or statements that "people who only want to see the other guy get bonked by the mods" use to satisfy their ravenous desire for revenge and further the potential for players with clashing ideological beliefs to be removed from the site and therefore unable to sway their ideas in any meaningful way, which is just what they like: no competition.

And then when they try to come over to the other parts of the forums, they carry with them a schizophrenic-like paranoia that everyone around them wants to debunk their theories, making them defensive and hostile to people who are just using this site to have fun without worrying about political opinions and events occurring in the real world. Some can be quite nice and chill outside of NSG, but I would be lying if I said that almost everyone got along when they stepped into a different forum. There are people who will constantly chuck political opinions, media, essays, ideologies, and doctrine in your face whether you ask for it or not. They're not doing this because they want us to just know about what they believe, they want us to believe what they believe so that we join them in their futile "holy war" of attrition against the people they disagree with politically. They want us to think what they think without questioning it ourselves. They want us to support them because if they think that "mostly everyone around me believes what I do!" then they will feel better about themselves. They feel like they have to worry less about refuting the opponents' points because they've already refuted them all in their head... right? There is no more opponent. There's no more second opinion. The dissonance is lost and shattered, and the confirmation bias hardens and solidifies. Evidently the other guy didn't know what the hell he was talking about.

It's funny: if we only have one side of politics, it's just an echo chamber, but if we have two sides, it turns into a fucking psychological warzone. Now, do the things here apply to all NSG players? No, of course not. But that's the thing you have to worry about: NSG players see stuff like this and they say that this isn't true and doesn't apply to them even if it does. This is in part because of that cognitive dissonance: they think they're champions of the superior political ideology, but then when presented with the idea that a good percent of users think of them as ill-behaved players who constantly scream politics into everyone's ears against their will and require constant moderator intervention to fix their messes, they now have two conflicting opinions of themselves. Whichever one you think is more true is up to you, but if the repeated political conflict in General has shown me anything, I can safely say that NSG--the good, the bad, and the ugly of it--is wholly an NS Cliche.

Utopias are...well. Unattainable. But they can be fun, and of course NS isn't always supposed to be realistic, so you do you.

Tbh I would like to see more nations exploring unintended consequences. Whether anarchist societies, liberal democracies with some kind of twist, or whatever. (Maybe?) an example would be how TNO give more importance to the Nazis' structural flaws inherent to its very design that result in various problems, one that hampers the very goals they themselves set to achieve, instead of just "hurr durr Nazi bad coz of genocide". I guess that's where I want to bring my nation to be, although I haven't really think about how or where I should implement them.

Thats why the only way I interact with NSG is leaving a quirky comment or a small joke and then leave, never to be seen again. Although the only way I actually enter a NSG thread is by the "Latest Forum Topics." Besides that, I've never once touched it.

I have participated in some threads here and there, and maybeeee ones that really matter or concerned me (see Coup in Burma), but other than that... eh, I leave a post or two then run off. It's not a troll and run, either. I like to think that my views are often "Oh yeah, I agree" or "That's an interesting take, but sure".

Probably the most controversial take I have in my life (RL or NS, or... something) so far is me not liking coffee or tea.

I have participated in some threads here and there, and maybeeee ones that really matter or concerned me (see Coup in Burma), but other than that... eh, I leave a post or two then run off. It's not a troll and run, either. I like to think that my views are often "Oh yeah, I agree" or "That's an interesting take, but sure".

Probably the most controversial take I have in my life (RL or NS, or... something) so far is me not liking coffee or tea.

same. for one, that stuff really doesn't taste good in my opinion if you aren't dousing it in cream and sugar. two, over time you can form a caffeine dependency quite easily after drinking stuff like that. the same goes with energy drinks and caffeinated sodas. three... i mean, it's nowhere near as expensive as say, cigarettes and alcohol, but it's still a habit and you're still paying money for it on a regular basis.
