They would be taken in commission to decide if the individual needs to go on trial, or to pardon them as long as they help the government to make sure this doesn't happen again, if you go on trial you risk a 20.000$ lawsuit for hacking & hijacking, but if they get pardoned they will help the government and probably would get a commendation to work more with the government edit: ninja'd. For AN: no punishment, but they might get in trouble with their health insurer if they run into any trouble.

For AAN: Highly context-specific. Our freedom of expression is tightly regulated. Out in the open the activities which we could simply surmise as "hate speech" might have consequences such as curtailing their political rights or interventions. Within the institutions designed for open exchange of ideas, access to which is gated through different venues which are meant to ensure the member is cognizant of their duty before society and doesn't just use his voice to manipulate people into working for his own selfish cause, they would not be regulated by any other means than the reaction of their peers.

That is far from criminal in the eyes of the Arimanni. As a tribe honouring its ancestral religion, public worship is expected, and reducing religion to a solitary or individual matter would be considered beyond alien.
