"On the track "Dan And Tim, Reunited By Fate", Tiny Mix Tapes wrote that "the pair cherrypick tropes from a number of bleak traditions: reverb-drenched industrial beats; doom-metal sludge; shoegaze drones conjured from effects pedals; post-punk bass chuggery; a plaintive piano+static post-rock crescendo." Tiny Mix Tapes also wrote that the band hold this genre palette together "by matching its compositional ambitions with idiosyncratic recording and production techniques."

“Cadonica wrote:

Yeah, I just much prefer songs/albums that aren't smash up of gazillion genres to give it ridiculously long name trying to fit every influence in it. Those songs feel like they don't know what they want to be. But that's just me.

Depends the band. This band it works fine. But there are ones, that are usually avant-garde bands, that kinda just throw out 5 different genres in one song and it feels...forced. Though there's a lot of good avant-garde, too. It really just depends how the band executes it.

Talk Talk-The Rainbow

Interesting how in the 80's this album got mostly mixed to negative reviews, and now it's highly praised.

That previous song I posted I ran across a while back and enjoyed, and I got reminded of the album again, so I figured I'd give it a listen.

Metallica - The Thing That Should Not Be

Song title is also my opinion of the song.

I didn't. But once I heard it, I didn't even need to check the lyrics or the name, I had FELT that "hey, this has to be that so called "Master of Puppets"". It was like... 20th or so Metallica song I heard ☐

Metallica - Disposable Heroes

Seriously, Master of Puppets might be my number one favorite album ever IF there was no The Thing That Should Not Be.
