I don't even own a cellphone ☐

Or much music, but I refuse to illegally download it, either. Most of the music I listen to is on Spotify, with occasional exceptions of me using YouTube to listen to stuff NOT on Spotify. I pretty much know everything on here (except stuff I've yet to go through, which isn't that huge of a number), but there's quite a lot on here that I only find okay after going through it, and I probably should begin to clear it out...Even if I clear out most of it but leave a couple of songs from the album because I still find them to be good. It's probably best I begin to trim things down, but right now I'm focusing on going through stuff again and rating them, because I used to just listen through music and never rate them. Now I want to so I can keep track of what I actually want to own.

I can't rate songs. Or movies for that matter. There's just too many things that count. My current mood, how long it's been since I've listened to it, what I'm into lately, the artist, whether it has some emotional value, liking it just for 1 aspect, just proud to know an OK song that 'no-one' else knows, etc. When I find myself skipping songs too often, I sort my library by artist and decide whether I've been skipping the songs unjustly or that my taste has just changed a bit. When my library becomes too big to do it that way I'll probably start rating too.

My libraries way too big. I've listened to literally over a thousand albums. Not songs, albums. It's been a HUGE hobby of mine for over a year now. I just love finding new sounds too much.

Though like I said earlier, right now, I'm focusing on re-listening to stuff, to finalize my opinions on them.

Julia Holter-Finale

Maybe I should've said "early" instead of young. I mean, if finding new music is a hobby of yours you're likely to change your opinion on songs that you've liked in the past. If you've never thought: "why did I like this?!", you're probably gifted. And maybe, just like when watching movies or reading books, there's beauty in finding new things in old things, and therefore in never finalizing your opinion about arts. But maybe I misinterpreted "finalizing".

I've had plenty of stuff I looked back at, already, that I go "Why did I like this?". Not so much with newer music that I've heard, though I've definitely had a couple that after a second listen, I don't like as much. I'm at the point now that I don't really expect to have so much of "Why did I like this?" anymore. I'm past that age. But now I'm going through all of the albums I've listened to and figuring out how much I actually like them. Or quickly going through them and deciding how much I like them, because there's a lot of stuff I have that was boring enough I don't feel like going through again. I'm making lists of all of this, too. Rating them on Rateyourmusic, that sort. Though I have everything written down on Notepad, too. I'm just trying to remind myself how much I actually liked all of this stuff. Because I went through sooo much new music that I spent more time listening to new music than actually finding out how much I truly liked it. Though almost anything that I really enjoy, I can like on the first listen.

You've said it 3 times now, I think, and the penny has finally dropped. Rating albums rather than songs might be a good idea for me too, for the more complete albums that I have at least. It's probably easier to decide about too.

Not listening anything as I'm on my way to bed.
