I feel like I need to address this...but people who are based on one of the three superstates of 1984 but do not realize that those superstates and their militaries use technology straight from WW2; instead you see those people add in laser weapons, space ships, giant walkers and so on.

My personal understanding of 1984's setting is after everybody got done nuking each other, and once these totalitarian dictatorships set up shop, they have no interest making their armies too powerful; instead they deliberately build and use the technology that's already around and ship that stuff to the Equatorial Front. Rinse and repeat or something.

Well, if there are people who think Orwell wrote 1984 just because "he is against Communism", let alone if they can understand the politics behind the three superstates.

George Orwell? 'Against communism?' There are actual people who believe that he, the George Orwell, who fought on the side of the Republicans against the Nationalists, survived a shot to his throat, in the Spanish Civil War, wrote 1984 as a commentary against Communism?

Nah, our country's politics are still a little more insane, since according to our extreme right, communism = big business owned by the Chinese-Christians. Seriously. It is so warped that the left is pro-businesses, supporting deregulation and investment, while the right wants to significantly increase welfare, even if the goal is merely populism.

To get things back into clichés, perhaps "equality" (in an ethnic context) is cliche? Many players opt for an egalitarian state where everyone kinda has the same chance. If there is discrimination, it's often in a (1) religious, (2) speciest, or (3) Nazi context. Unless for one or two, I haven't seen states where the "protagonist side" is "pro-racism" (whether openly or, more interestingly, subtly and structurally), but not batshit insane.

I think it's a result of being a racist isn't socially acceptable anymore, so people skirt around the subject of controversy.

Here in the PUCCR, legally all races are equal but in everyday life the Juwanese diaspora are implicitly discriminated against, since they are racially associated with the 2nd Juwanese Empire which started a world war that went nuclear. It's a lot harder to police since its more subtle and behind closed doors, as opposed to if it were systematic discrimination which is way too obvious.

It's a known fact that for every one person who's actually read 1984, there are one hundred people who have never read it and only know the most basic plot outline of the story and absolutely nothing about Orwell's actual politics.

OK I may have made that up.

Honestly, I've tried to touch on "The protagonist is racist" with a few of my nations, but generally speaking, I never was allowed to fully explain it.

Not because of outside affairs, I want to talk about these kinds of things because they interest me in a morbid way. But because I am too lazy to explain the complex relationship between the various human races of the HfOS, or how The Near Islands still has a large number of people who dislike the Japanese for what they did during WW2.

I might get around to touching on these topics in the near future, but eh - not really one of my priorities unfortunately.

There's no doubt that we're all guilty of skimming over each other's leaders to find an aspect we like and/or don't like about them (politically and personally).

Our leaders will only like each other if the other leaders share the same opinions and beliefs as they do, and here all of our leaders share the exact same opinions and beliefs.

I don't either, but I think leaders should have a reason to yell at other leaders, even ones who share the same opinions and beliefs.

I mean, we're all so used to receive compliments in these YL's Opinion on AL threads, let's try adding more flavour to our characters, their positive traits and their flaws.

At least for nations with a cast of characters, you could write a character that likes one leader, a char who is the complete opposite and utterly detest them, and a char who can appreciate someone for who they are, past their beliefs. I agree with Kaisertliche, it's wasted potential to have a set of multiple characters who all share the same mindset— they're basically gonna be saying the same message only in a different way.

For the PUCCR, I've established they're all Communist in their biographies, and use forum interactions to establish their differences. They might not all respond or react to things the same way, nor necessarily agree or disagree with one another, even if they all fundamentally have the same principles it doesn't mean there won't be differences because interpretation of those values are still subject to how you feel about it. So it's good to have some diversity, not just ethnically speaking, diversity of ideas and perspective is what makes people feel like people.

Unless you're a hivemind then this needs not apply, and different species will comes with different circumstances because they might not at all have to think like a human does.
