I'd agree and say what you said is fair, considering how limited our definitions of "nation" are compared to what might possibly be considered as a "nation", but on the other hand I think it's really difficult for many of us to envision a stateless nation as opposed to the sort every recognised nation on Earth is. So when we hear the word "nation", we automatically pivot towards thinking of a bureaucratic structure, hierarchies, territory of some sort as opposed to a conglomeration of people with a common past. After all, we've grown up in this sort of society (unless one of you is from Zapatista territory or something, in which case mantener la lucha contra la injusticia, mis camaradas), and we know nothing but society organised around states, borders, and governments.

At risk of getting back on my aforementioned box... ^^;

While statelessness is the case for some indigenous peoples, numerous North American tribal nations do have states, with borders, constitutions, citizenships, voting, executives, representatives, etc.* The Haudenosaunee even issue passports. I'm not saying being a nation-state is the ideal societal organization—after all, it's not how these tribal nations used to organize—but it is their real organization in the present, the evidence of their adaptation, resilience, survival, and continued existence as distinct geopolitical entities who maintain their sovereignty as nations with their own governments, empowered by their own people who have their own right to self-determination. Most of the general U.S. public—frankly, most political leaders, even—have the erroneous belief that indigenous society is a relic of the past, or even that indigeneity itself is somehow "gone" from the continent. Heck, people still put American Indian relics in natural history museums, as if the stories of the Utes or O'odham or Ojibwe belong next to dinosaur bones instead of next to the stories of other human beings.

...Sorry if this sounds at all stern. I hope you (and anyone else reading) knows I don't mean to accuse. I don't expect anyone not from the U.S. to be more informed about indigenous rights and sovereignty than U.S. Americans are (or perhaps better said, are not). And most Americans being ill informed is typically the result of public and private education, making it a consequence of forebears' actions—and their forebears before them.

*The "domestic dependent nation" classification does create a weird gray area, but it remains the case that many tribal nations have governments, constitutions, borders, territory, etc.

TL;DR: "Modern indigenous nation-state" as a NationStates concept might require carefulness because there are modern indigenous nation-states that often get forgotten.

Building on top of this, I genuinely don't and would be stupid to expect anyone to write the length of posts that I and some others might write every now and then, neither do I expect the level of effort to match the insanely long post that some might spot across the forums. One can easily be concise and show some understanding of what they've read. Just a thoughtful sentence or two but eh, I'm only lingering on this site because I want to reply substantially to people who deserve some thought on their lore. It doesn't really take that long for me to write a few paragraphs of my thoughts and opinion so I don't see why I shouldn't. That and I'm awful at being concise anyways. I've long since stopped caring about the replies I get, unless there's thought behind the replies but that is rather rare.

Yah, I feel like it's simultaneously hard to be concise, but also like everything ends up being way shorter than I want it to be!

I also just kinda wish there were some better alternative to what NS, and F7 in particular, can be- it just seems like the constant barrage of low-effort posters chases off so many of the good, fun, and interesting users...

Well, no. I'm not saying it's strictly about length. I'm largely, just like you, interested in the user's thoughts and opinions that reflect their understanding of what they've read but at the same time, I'm not asking anyone to write huge posts, hence why I say that being concise helps save effort and time. Some are better than others when it comes to being concise. I'm at the bottom of the barrel in that regard, hence why I resort to long posts.

One line spam RPer's have been beaten to death here already, but there's also the sort that does make effortposts but said effortposts make absolutely no sense and essentially amount to one line spam, posts that go in depth about how, say, their planes magically got to your capital city, or your ships sank even though they outnumbered the enemy, etc.

I've generally been adjusting my post effort based on how much effort the person I'm replying to makes in their posts.

The issue is that these people don't care if you respond to them with low quality shit. They really don't. Because at the end of the day they can just churn out fifty more of their low quality summerposts, or they just don't care. They're here to either get satisfaction out of spamming enough of their dollar-store lore without regards for people who've put effort, heart and soul into their creations. Nothing makes me more annoyed than instances recently; I've seen summerposters absolutely stiff blessed effortposters like ASDF (Wexas), Kiu, Bloodshade and more who put LOTS of work into what they do.

At the end of the day the only way to win against these people is to foelist them where you see them. If we all start ignoring them, we might just end up with a decent forum.

If I am going to be honest, I don't see a point to churning out paragraph-posts on F7 when I already do a multitude of that in dedicated roleplay threads. A couple of sentences that are well-written are good enough for me.

Maybe I am just not immersed enough into F7's post-culture, or something of that sort.

No, this is fair.

I personally find it impossible to give in-depth criticism without making at least one or two paragraphs, but for most non-writing-related topics a competent vocabulary, actual reading comprehension, and two or three well-written sentences of analysis at most generally suffice.

I should have made clear that length matters but there are also ways to show quality without writing sentences upon sentences. It's easy to know if one doesn't do the reading required, unless you're very good at writing without actually including any content.

Oh, my bad. I tend to take things too bluntly, generally speaking and especially online, so it's my mistake. I suck at deciphering someone's words without tone or body language to aid the transmission of the message, hence why I think it's an important part of any story 🤔

This is really beautiful and outlines a very good-faith and helpful analysis of the issue that actually I think has some merit. But I'm a hateful bastard and I'm not convinced; fundamentally, I'm more of the idea that the two worlds of "effortposting" and "summerposting" (I hate using those terms, they sound so elitist, but there's no real better way to say it) are irreconcilable and are gonna drive each other apart no matter what. Ultimately, the conclusion is probably going to be the loss of "effortposting". Because whereas an effortpost requires a lot of effort to produce, summerposters can grow more numerous and spammy by the day. Effortposters are eventually gonna get bored and leave.

I don't see it as an issue of who is the "interloper" or not. I just see people putting hard work in and getting spat on for it. Sure -- writing is its own reward, but at the same time I think I speak for a lot of us here that we write with the idea that other people will [a] appreciate and [b] (most importantly) ENJOY what we write. I hang out here because there are a few people here who I think are cool as fuck and unfortunately I don't happen to share any discord servers with. Plus, I like getting lore feedback on SR, which is an added bonus. Plus, the AL threads are quite endearing and fun and it's really difficult to replicate that in a discord channel. I've seen it tried and it never works. I just tend to vent about these sorts of posters because I do see F7 as a genuinely cool place full of awesome people (such as yourself). I'm somewhat consigned to the idea that things are gonna get worse before they get better (if they get better), but I'll try and keep posting until everyone else is gone. I know we can't get rid of summerposters. I know they have just as much right to use the site as I do. I'm just tired of it and I occasionally rant because I do see a lot of people who deserve better.

No, this is a perfectly fair analysis of the issue too, and you are right. I don't think the two groups can be reconciled either, actually; there's no real way it can be done on a mass level. I just think we kinda have to stick around and help those who actually care find a way to actually improve by providing an example for them, and if we don't then there's no way in hell we can see improvement.

Ultimately summerposting amounts to people doing hard work and getting spat on for it, like you said. Imo- and I don't mean to sound preachy or patronizing here- I think that if we accept that and try to work past it then we might have a chance at managing to help a few more people get better just on the basis of not spitting back in return like we are now.

Either we make new effortposters or we accept that when we go then that'll be it, and I don't see a way to make new effortposters without meeting summerposters halfway- it's that or wait until an effortposter stumbles onto NS out of sheer blind luck.

That's something I should bear in mind more; I'm plenty guilty of relying on stereotypes of the thread more than experience. My own brief lurks and even stints in NSG over-color my perception. I'm glad your experience is more positive! It's really quite encouraging to think that folks, even strangers on the Internet, can evenly talk to each other about important topics when when they may disagree.

i mean yeah you're pretty much on the ball there. in fact; it's the most logical and sensible conclusion. i just tend to rant a lot because i'm salty with these things.

at the end of the day, i've got an unreasonably short temper and i just see certain posts that just make me... :|

South Reinkalistan is a massive, ecologically-diverse nation notable for its roving student militias and widespread hatred for the elderly. In the midst of a room-temperature cultural revolution that's lost its momentum, the Party carefully plans its next move. As the brittle bones of fragile empires begin to crack beneath their own weight, history's symphony reaches crescendo pitch. The future is all but certain.

No, this is a perfectly fair analysis of the issue too, and you are right. I don't think the two groups can be reconciled either, actually; there's no real way it can be done on a mass level. I just think we kinda have to stick around and help those who actually care find a way to actually improve by providing an example for them, and if we don't then there's no way in hell we can see improvement.

Ultimately summerposting amounts to people doing hard work and getting spat on for it, like you said. Imro- and I don't mean to sound preachy or patronizing here- I think that if we accept that and try to work past it then we might have a chance at managing to help a few more people get better just on the basis of not spitting back in return like we are now.

me too bro, me too :powercry:

i actually only realized this this afternoon in the course of writing a separate effortpost about how we might make more effortposters after getting short-changed one too many times in the span of a few hours for my taste.

i mean at the end of the day it's pretty much an issue of how patient we're willing to be.

I agree pretty much entirely with that post. One thing though is that I think it will eventually lead to the death of the "effortposter", which is interesting for me personally since I straddle the line. Either way I think the proportion of low-effort F7 threads will just keep rising in the future.

ye, that's the rub. "they" (and for the record I agree, "summerposter" sounds horribly elitist) have more time than "we" do.

yeah... though I doubt it'll keep rising indefinitely; f7 surges and swells in effort regularly, imo.
