While a central government is theoretically present, and the leader has quite a bit of bearing on the direction of the nation as a whole, the majority of the Patagonian population is subdivided into numerous tribes and independent communities, with various overarching unions controlling certain aspects of society.

Greater Gilead wrote:

Importing pornography into Gilead is grounds for immediate deportation, and the offender is permanently barred from national entry from then on.

The Burke Islands wrote:

They have some strange dress restrictions on tourists.

@Surrealist Patagonia

They have an intimidating flag you may think would be on a fascist empire nation, but they are actually a rather decentralized confederacy.

The Islands are well-known for their prominent metal scene, and their music seems to echo their generalized cultural sentiment of gritty, brutal pessimism in some regard.

According to the state-owned 'tourist guide' section of their website, North America is Sol's (Essentially all of the cities in the Moon) #1 destination. North America is also said to be the place of 'many vibrant cultures', presumably thanks to the intermingling of various hispanic, french and english groups have experienced ever since the emergence of North America as a nation.

Atrahasian Philosophy, personified by that ~~tenatli~~ body-diagram system, could be interpreted as being parallel/similar to a very libertarian interpretation of Burkean Organic Society, expressed briefly. Society, the State and it's unofficial components like family are recognized but there is wariness over perceived tyranny.

During the Cultural Reawakening, a movement that sought to preserve Tohorinese culture through the elimination of foreign influence, there was an event known as the "Frog Burning" which involved the destruction of all things French. French books, artworks, and films were burned with the help of French wine. This special hatred was presumably due to prior French occupation and looting of precious artifacts.

How exactly does one manage to make a language secret? I mean, if it's an actual language, it has basis in something which most likely means written instances of said language. You can't just hide a form of tongue. Well, at least not forever.

The ruling Asian Communist Party follows a socialist, pan-Asian nationalist ideology that combines elements of Juche, Maoism, and traditional beliefs held throughout Asia. It adopted the name Orientalism as a sort of inversion of the traditional interpretation of the term, i.e. a conception of Asian culture as static, underdeveloped, and inferior, instead making Asia out as a bastion of collectivism and morality against Western neoliberalism.

The UCA is a hereditary dictatorship which uses monarchical terminology to design it's absolute ruler despite it's supposedly communist ideology; King Miles and Queen Asia have many heirs to choose on as they have 18 children, even if it's understood the eldest will take his father's place after the latter's death.

Once named the "Cat house of the Atlantic" , it is now an isolated society, thanks to a coup and a cultural uprising which destroyed much of the island's previous exploitative heritage.

The Entente Powers disposed of the Royal Emissary and France took the Sun Goddess' Three Sacred Treasures, something that'd ICly be comparable to deposing a Japanese Emperor and stealing the Kaaba. Hence the cartoonish francophobia. /Stillme

They really, really hate the French. Whilst the Occitan people weren't really all too fond of them either, they never had an event like the Tohorinese Karu-kerkele. Literally translated as "frog frying", during this event the Tohorinese people burned anything even remotely related to the French. Except for French books dedicated to science, technology, engineering, and mathematics, for whatever reason. All in all, these people don't seem to be particularly pleasant.
