Officially, the entirety of the nation partially runs off of a state-planned economy while experts perpetually argue that the majority if not the entirety of the economy is state planned with additional arguments being made that the nation is socialist. However, the nation argues that they are unable to be classified as practicing any traditional economic system as they do not believe in capitalism, socialism, or communism. Additionally, the national government's Department of Economics states that "while a large amount of the investment of resources is state planned, there is areas in which the government is not consistently involved. Private transactions may be made between individuals and small groups as it allows for the replenishing of resources. As such, it does not necessitate government intervention so long as it does not result in the detrimental stockpiling of wealth."

New Periaipsis uses an innovative economic method of "Credits" which is based around an intricate blend of community-focused work and analytical decisions involving mathematics that account for the value of resources involved, time required, maintenance of surplus, and the education or training required to make a specific product. While competition is not promoted with this system, denizens are encouraged to work collaboratively in order to continually improve their future. Consequently, practices such as planned obsolescence are both forbidden by legislative action and vilified by the public, who view consumerism as being toxic.

Unfortunately due to the unique economic system used, reliable conversions from Credits to any other currency have not as of yet been officially possible mathematically according to the international community, with attempted efforts continually bringing unsuccessful results. It should be noted that some Periaipsis government workers and economists have argued as it is the fault of the foreign civilian public for not perceiving the converted values as "consistent" when comparing different goods and services due to the differences in their individually respective levels of complexity and the necessity or overall value it has to society.

Despite this complication, the nation of New Periaipsis is quite notable in international trade. The nation's leading exports are ecotourism, scientific research, and industry. The industrial sector, which is quite specialized, is mostly made up of the Information Technology industry, with significant contributions from Arms Manufacturing and Book Publishing. Additionally, the nation pursues a policy of autarky, the state of economic self-sufficiency.

This economic system sounds like third positionism in theory. Anyways, it's interesting.

The First Kroraini Republic was a short lived breakaway state founded from an independence movement and largely dominated by foreign muslims. It was quashed by Hui warlords which nominally ended the republic but its legacy lived on to inspire the creation of the Second Kroraini Republic.

Their nations government is run by a presidential republic that gives out money to corporations, who get to participate with the government to decide projects and affairs.

Also, I'm sorta getting a Dutch East India Company vibe from this. It probably isn't, but that's what I'm getting.

Kronova's land mostly consists of having a temperate continental climate akin to Europe; though their Northern regions have the taiga biome and further northward it turns to tundra.
