You literally called your new nation "I Hate Northumbria". Don't complain about being 'interrupted'.

Just depends on the context of the character. Do that for a serious gritty character in your fantastical setting, you can't pull it off. Do it for someone in an MT setting like a racer, and voila, it works.

Hyper-commodified cocaine capitalism. Urbanized solar systems. Omnixenophobia. War economy without end. Radical body augmentation for fun and profit.

I make exactly two exceptions from a fairly strict adherence to realism, and hate them both.

Well unless you're going to make a literal boss fight/video game centered around them I don't see it as necessary, just a fun little aesthetic

As for the topic of themes... Yeah, they're not necessary, and they're normally goofy except for a few exceptions. I used to do it in my early days, but not anymore. Either I wasn't able to pull it off properly or I just don't know how.

Still, Kako's unofficial theme is Smile by Jeff Lynne (A cover of Chaplin's

Edit: Also, regarding the above post... I agree. I've recently moved to Florida from Venezuela and fuck - shit's insane down in the south, but the further up north you go, the tamer stuff gets, and I've only gotten as far as West Palm Beach. Miami should be its own madness center really.

They really aren't, but sometimes it just adds to expressing a character's general personality and also helps with going into the author's head and seeing where they tried to take their character.

I thought Miami would be rather tame compared to rural Florida, although I do not know as I have never set foot on U.S. soil that was not an embassy.

Eh, we all know that every good villain must have a theme song. That's just an ancient law mandated by God. Although personally, I used FF6's "Dancing Mad" for my characters since the song has four separate movements that I can assign to characters based on their role, giving some kind of a sense of continuity, at least in my head.

I mean that's part and parcel, isn't it? I dunno, I'd take hurricanes over drab rain all the time with a few weeks of "everything's on fire". But hey, I guess it's different once you're living there all the time.

(Too lazy to switch accounts sorry)

Honestly the lack of power after hurricanes is bearable during the daytime since you can at least see and do stuff like read books or whatever to pass the time but it's nighttime that kills you and makes you appreciate artificial lighting. I'm talking barely even 8pm and it's completely goddamn pitch black can't even see your hand in front of your face level of darkness, so there's literally nothing you can do short of lying in bed and trying to sleep even though it's way too hot and humid to do that so you end up moaning and groaning until you eventually do fall asleep at god knows when because there're no clocks and you're so tired at that point you'll fall asleep no matter the temperature.

Did I mention it's hot and humid here? The thermometer might say it's 89 degrees out but if it's like 75% humidity, it's gonna feel like it's 106. I bring multiple water bottles when I go out, I need 'em.

Ah, I still love it here anyways.

With our, little recent thing out of the way... lack of tropes, not cliches this time. 🤔

I want to see a nation with non-carbon lifeforms. I mean sure, most of the life we meet IRL are almost-always carbon-based, but come on, I want to see someone made out of Arsenic. Or Francium.

I'm actually thinking of adding a race based on the elements of the periodic system to my setting, with a hierarchy based on what state an element is in at room-temperature.
