If we're to take their injudicious quoting of Mao as indicative of value (and I think the constant preening to Maoism backs that up), they have every intent to slaughter ideologically inconvenient intellectuals.

"Let a hundred flowers bloom, let a hundred schools of thought contend."

So went the historical words.

Basically the whole pantheon except Zûn is TES — it's the Khajiit pantheon run through the filter of the Tajik language for phonological constraints

That's not what that means.

That's the exact opposite of what that means.

What even.

It's Mao's way of saying come at me if ya disagree. Maoism is built on dissent between Party members. Of course, subversive activity is different.

Though it broaches upon the very difficult subject of whether to tolerate intolerance, making it illegal to insult the religions of others sounds like it would be very vulnerable to abuse. The line between critique and affront is not always clear.

Obliteration of the Self (Chinese: 消除自我, Filipino: Obliterasyon ng Katauhan) is the collective term for the numerous cults of personality which have organized themselves into the national religion of the Pan-Asiatic States. There is no official term or demonym to refer to oneself as a follower of the philosophy due to the sheer nature of its existence. Neither are there social or political roles which "head" it. It is a not an organized religion, or even an actual religion per se, but is usually treated like one by foreign critiques and even the Pan-Asiatic government itself.

The memetic axioms are so pervasive in this nation, it's sprawled into a bizarrely Kafkaesque microcosm of its own
