"In all My eternity of life, I refuse to accept that there has ever been such a failure of a leader as him. Whereas other incompetent leaders are content to wallow in failure through way of civil war- for some reason, failures are always met by civil war, I do not claim to know why- via family conflict or else someone else seeking to free themselves from such failure, it is he alone who fails in both ways. While initially, I had some small pity for him, as a result of his unfortunate circumstances, upon learning that half his rebels seem to be fighting for his brother as well, I simply cannot continue to have any respect for one such as him. Leave him to the rebels, leave him to the vultures- leave him to death, for all I care- he is unworthy of his current status, and this is simply the natural order reasserting itself upon his weak frame."

Compile all her information into a single factbook, or create a hub in her regular factbook that links to her mentions in other factbooks then. cool premise, if not a bit predictable.(the supernatural element, as there seems to be a lot of people on NS that go for the magic, or immortal, or all-powerful entity, routes for their leaders)

"Blah Blah Blah. That's all I hear from you, bureaucratic nonsense. This was the face of pre-event democracy? Suits crying over the fact a leader of some foreign nation doesn't give out free healthcare? Or commoners crying over the fact their democratically elected leader didn't lower the taxes a bit? No wonder why they collapsed if people like you were behind it. Making a plant legal is one of your biggest accomplishments? Along with giving money to people who already live lives leagues more comfortable than some backwater shitholes?"

I've seen Kings, Dukes, even Republicans and Chieftans unite their people to defeat vagabonds, rapists, invaders both foreign and domestic. Men have fought and bled for the ideals they believe in, for their families, for their King and Gods. And yet you want to preach to us about the evils of the Red-tied Suits? Or the petty dictator of some far-off land? Don't make me laugh.

Besides, who decided you should be sovereign? You're probably on more medications than a cripple. It's one thing to have a weak ruler, but to have one that needs to be babied around to survive? Then again, that just sounds like how California was... you know before they collapsed. If it ain't obvious by now, I don't like you nor your kind of neo-liberal official. And I ain't sayin' that as a monarch, I'm sayin' that as a man who had to trudge through the wasteland to survive the Kemet-forsaken world your kind left me with."

"It is a true tragedy to see an America that is not only divided but has regressed to the Middle Ages. And instead of modelling after medieval republics like Friesland and Switzerland, they instead took after the feudal and monarchic model.

I still support their war against the redskin hordes, but I honestly am distraught at 'Wexas'. It is as if the American spirit had disappeared from their land.

For goodness sakes, their king doesn't even know how to load a lever-action! Here's a hint, medieval cowboy: it loads from the fucking side! One bullet at a time!

Honestly, I think the sorts of guns that'd survive aging the best would be single shot breech-loaders, as they have the simplest actions. I have my very own Joslyn carbine that I purchased from an antique firearms auction. Thank you, Gun Jesus!

Seriously, I hope the people of Texas regain their American spirit of liberty and start another Texian revolution against feudal rule.

That and find out HOW America was even reduced to such a state.

"I had expected, in my return to this sort of thing, for there to have been at least some change, if not outright improvement, to the standards by which we set international leaders. I see now that such an expectation was little more than naivete on my part. Indeed, to call these two children rulers would be an insult to the term - though tragic victims, they have no right to remain in power. Plucked from their civilian lives and drafted as child soldiers, they fought in a conflict that was not theirs to fight. I cannot fault them for this. Yet it does not in any way justify the atrocities they committed in mock "revenge" for a war in which their nation was the aggressor. The directionless, shambling husk of a junta they established in the wake of all this has no right to even be termed a nation - it is a collective preoccupied with nothing save its own frenzied survival, built on a shell-ideology. Without a guiding hand, it will crumble; such guidance is in no way obtainable from a pair of war-scarred preadolescents, or whatever shadowy ministers may be puppeteering them. One cannot undo the sins of the past merely by ignoring them - though of course, I cannot expect children to understand such a thing. They must be deposed; whether or not they deserve to stand trial thereafter is not for me to decide. But whatever the case, they must be brought down from power, so that their nation may at the very least live to see another decade or two."

"An oddity, this one. Possessing near-absolute power over her subjects in theory, and yet being gradually phased out by the instruments of state she herself unknowingly helped create. A self-proclaimed goddess, yet merely one in a myriad of similar entities. I find it difficult to formulate a personal opinion here; she wishes to be worshipped and revered, even granted sacrifices, and yet withholds herself from interfering in her subjects' lives. Her apparent distaste for theocracies only serves to confuse me further, though I suppose there must be some inherent distaste to having one's name and identity used as merely a tool of control by others. Thus my judgment, such as it is, will remain resolutely neutral; she is, pardon my pun, out of her depth in the modern clime. It is saddening and encouraging in equal measure, speaking both of humanity's drive for progress, and its worrying tendency to forget its past. I suppose I pity her, in some small way - it is likely that one day, she will simply end up purged from the memory and consciousness her creations. And what will be left for her then?"
