It is true that cliché isn't inherently bad, there are ways to make it work. But it's hard; done without finesse, cliché can drag you out of a work far easier, quicker, and harder than poor writing can. Here's a J.P. Beaubien video to explain it easier than I can. You won't hear exactly the same arguments I'm making, he's a little more favorable to them, but the points he brings up are valid.

Clichés do work. They wouldn't be cliché if they didn't; but now that they are overdone it does kinda take a very skilled writer to pull them off and make them feel right to the reader.

Hey, it's JP! Yeah, you (and he) make a good point. Cliche is necessary to make a story recognizable, I think, because it consists of common elements the reader can recognise and characterize the tale with. But you can't rely entirely on it, because if you do then nothing distinguished your work from a mass of clichés and ideas nicked from someone else.

Honestly I'm gonna have to disagree. There's plenty of well written FFT+ Space Empires out there, but the blandness of their concept makes them all blend together. They can be the best written version of a nation but if I've seen 344 of the exact same thing, I'm still gonna consider it boring. Call of Duty, for what it's worth, is perfectly fine in execution but everyone hates it because it's bland and generic military shooter tripe. On the other hand, I can get past an iffy execution if the concept is neat and not done to death.

Thing is, what constitutes 'neat and not done to death' is kind of a subjective measure.

Let's actually take Godular as an example for this point. His nation is the epitome of "FFT+ badass." And it works because it's got an interesting twist to it, and because the characters are compelling. We can't ignore the fact that a nation lives or dies based on its characters, though there needs to be a control framework for each of these characters to operate in to make them, in turn, feel unique.

Another cliché that I thought of is nations using animated characters or real world celebrities for their national leader. It isn't necessary a bad thing to have I mean my current leader is from an animated TV show which also has comics as well. Thankfully no one hasn't recognized her yet!

A pet peeve of mine is people equating Matrilineality with Matriarchy. And then also portraying Matriarchy as either some kind of peaceful feminist lady-land or some kind of fetish-inducing Amazon femdom thing. I remember because all-female space empires were a thing two years back IIRC.

Me being my selfish, narcissistic self, was taken aback as the clichés made people overlook the fact my PT society's monogamous patriarchal elite abolished marriage among peasants and encouraged matrilineality to maintain their rule. That is anything but feminist.

Dunno who it is but the style is reminiscent of the Avatar comic books I've never read.

I've had that same thing happen too, on both this account and my main, though it's an issue of characterization rather than worldbuilding there. People look at Paterson Smith, think "Ooh, he's like me dad!" and write him off as a good albeit ineffectual chap, not a businessman whose political decisions have 80% of the time benefitted his own business. On the opposite end of the spectrum, people look at Ari and see that one line about "killing without hesitation" (which I got rid of for poor phrasing), and think she's a Bond villain, when what I meant was that her society (and her world at large) doesn't value life to the same degree we do. Hell, the Ghesites paint themselves in the blood of their enemies. And that sounds horrid, until you realise that they do it because they want to terrify others away as to avoid another fight, and it's not like these dead guys are using their blood anymore, so... it's a twofer!

Context is incredibly important. As is reading the entirety of a given factbook. i'm guilty of not doing that on more than one occasion.

Definitely, I've had that contextual issue with Tohorin as well. The simplest way I can put it is that thinking about a PT nation's morality often involves thinking about "Blue and Orange" value systems. Their needs are different and their perceptions of reality aren't going to be based on Modernist paradigms.

This isn't even close to NS-specific, but people who have zero idea about how businesses and economy function, and yet make their nations a soapbox about how corporate bad and governments and vigilante robin hoods good. The Old Guard and its movie adaptation are just about the worst examples of it in my recent memory. I get where it comes from, the India Companies/Banana Republics/1840s industrialists, but those are examples of their times, and not currently applicable. For more JP, he made a video on megacorporations like that. And to give a counterpoint, Shadowrun is an example of the same fantasy corporation thing but it has other things going for it, like good gameplay, so I don't mind it as much.

Leaf water good. Bean water bad. David Ricardo was on to something and so was Eugene Stoner.

I've noticed that a lot of nations are either pure Autocracies or true Democracies. I mean this in the sense that a large portion of nations are either nations with a singular autocrat with total god-emperor-like power over their nation or a Democracy that is rarely more corrupt or dysfunctional than the US. While the latter does definitely exist, and I am not saying that nations that are Autocracies or true Democracies are bad (hell, some of my favorite nations on NS fit either category), I just don't believe Democracy and Autocracy is a binary thing. Flawed Democracies, Oligarchies, Merchant Republics, Feudal Monarchies (with high amounts of noble rights), Elective Monarchies, hell even states controlled by a singular or multiple corporations (Behind the scenes or otherwise) among other such governmental systems are underrepresented by NS IMO

Like I said though, there are good pure Autocracies/true Democracies and bad Oligarchies/Flawed Democracies. So pls don't sue me.

Ten bazillion firearms and tanks that can punch holes through steel that would feasibly eat up like 75-80% of the national budget. Some variation of Imperial Germany or Russia - since who gives a damn about the Kingdom of Bavaria or Duchy of Nassau. Bonus points for forgetting that SE Asia or Oceania exists.

That's why neither Ari nor Pat have them. Well, they do, but they're in the "beliefs/policies" sections, and I try my best to explain their beliefs thoroughly with their reasoning for the positions they hold. And they're most certainly not color-coded buzzwords.

And if you like TWA, you'll probably like OSP and some of the other writing/worldbuilding channels too. I can only remember OSP and James Tullios right now, but there's others right on the tip of my tongue I can't quite recall.
