how about wings on spacecraft? i mean, I understand that you might have to use them within an atmosphere as well... but uh... other than that, just why? and considering that like 90% of nations with FT keep their ships... you know, not in atmospheric conditions, usually out in space or in a designated storage area that's literally just a straight line to an exit even if it is pressurized... it seems a little confusing why those would be there and always seem to be there in spacecraft.

This, tbh. I always imagined that spaceships that don't need to land would look like cylinders or rings that can rotate to provide gravity.

yeah, but that was a good 40 or so years ago. and even then, they still would've probably known that "space does not have air." and besides that, in each of their shows/movies, they had characters using their ships in atmospheric conditions where wings might be necessary... even if said wings were just a little impractical.

Speaking of spaceships, I don't think I have seen ones with engines that are unconventional or still hypothetical on IRL paper. Solar sails, for instance.

Don't get me wrong, some of these might or might not work due to the laws of physics and they are still in a testing phase IRL, but hey, science fiction, so it would be nice to see those spaceships with unorthodox types of engines.

There are quite a few of them if you look.

Alternatively, for the lols, mix magic and tech. A spaceship powered by freaking aether, or some angelic energy.

I'm not sure if your average Joe would like to hear about geometrically-shaped spacecraft calculating attack passes to fire projectiles with pinpoint accuracy in the vastness of multi-directional space BUT Hollywood execs would probably froth at their mouths at not sticking to the formula of warfare that resembles WW2-era dogfights and 18th Century naval battles.

Oh God...I'm having flashbacks at how crappy Battlefield Earth was...the shitty pilot lingo made things even more cringy...

See the problem I have with the zoomer slang (and no I'm not switching to Aikoland for this post) is that some of y'all act like you invented the term 'cringe'. Like I've been watching cringe comps on YouTube for at least the past 10+ year, cringe is a literal real word and not some new slang term. I could also go on about how a lot of zoomer 'surreal humor' is ultimately no different than the 'I AM VERY RANDOM RAWR XD' humor from when I was like 13-14, but that's for another topic. Shit cycles and everyone thinks they invented stuff that's been around for a long time.

Anyways, anyone else think it's kinda weird that NS doesn't just use a report button and instead has you report posts in public?

I kind of get why they do it to be honest. Say when the pornspammer comes around. The moderation forum gets 10 threads reporting the same person. No imagine that but worse because people are pressing the report button without knowing it's already been reported. Could lead to some things sliding under the radar in those kind of situations.

Republic of Dayganistan

A secular, Tajik dominated state in Central Asia which has experienced 40 years of democratic backsliding. NS stats are NOT used.
