"I see. A supporter of the wild life, I suppose, what with daring escapades and a desire to expand it to others. Seems a bit redundant to redact their face, what with them openly spouting about every adventure they've had, while also happily condemning others as "boring". No less the hypocrisy I'd expect from a paramilitary legionnaire whose troops happily write a biography, half made up of lies. Of course, my biggest hatred is the fact that she's a damn dirty commie."

"I have seen into his mind and it is empty. He has no thoughts, only impulses. He acts without direction or guidance. He is a boat without an oar lost in a storm, doomed to drift at random until it sinks. It is a waste. His mind, though hollow and devoid of conviction, is still sharp. He is not foolish or stupid; merely reckless and aimless. The worst aspect of his madness is that he enjoys it; it is, for him, a thrill of some kind. He is brilliant yet unintelligent at the same time. This paradox consumes him. In the end he will not be remembered, as all is kind often are. Perhaps he does not want to be? Perhaps immortality through memory does not entertain him? He is not an intellectual or a philosopher, no matter how much he may try and present himself as such. In the end he is nothing but an imaginative vagrant with a lot to say but little to talk about. There are plenty of men like him. There will be plenty of men like him. There will always be men like him, and they will always be forgotten. I have no opinion of him. There is no point."

"I have not been on our fair planet long enough to form an opinion on most things - let alone the higher powers, nor any have I the intelligence to discern their secrets. I ain't a smart man. No qualifications in Philosophy here, I'll be the first to admit. But surely, even Djinn's such as these must suffer from the psychological maladies that plague us regular people? Over-exhaustion, at the least? This Reo-"Empress Reo", lest I get a lightning bolt to the back of the head, for instance- Imagine, to have lived one's life not as yourself, the you you know you are, but as the incarnation of some long dead hero? It must be a privilege, yes; a great one perhaps. But none of your accomplishments shall be attributed to you. They shall be attributed to the number you came from. Perhaps there is solace in that for some- that'll be your number of incarnation, after all. But I do not think that is a way to live one's life, so prone to replacement. Hits too close to home.

Maybe it's the incarnations, maybe there is a serenity to this ease - but does having this all-powerful ability to hold- to not only maintain the prestige of such a lineage, but to act out its will, not come with the horror of weariness? Being the successor of anyone is hard enough, harder still if you didn't want it in the first place, but dealing with enemy after enemy, screaming villain after villain with seemingly no redeeming features, yet with no challenge at all- does that not bring a certain kind of depression? No task takes too much effort, not the mightiest drought nor the greatest fleet of war. Where comes the euphoria of true victory, grasped from the hands of defeat, when defeat is a foreign concept? How can one truly relax, sit back on a beachfront and enjoy themselves after the long journey that was their life, when one's journey was a straight road? Maybe I'm thinking too much into it. Maybe I'll get my mind melted for blasphemy against a monarch. They seem nice enough, in fairness. Maybe she's just lucky. Maybe she just needs to relax."

No, he is very much the opposite, his economic initiatives seem to have been successful and lead to the momentary success of Sanankou, at least until the corruption and tribalism that Republican government promotes tears it down sometime in the future. Overall our opinion on Jean-Baptiste is neutral, it would be positive had he only took the natural place of autocrat instead of humoring a republic."

"To govern is to possess a responsibility to one's country and the people that reside within it. This man has abused that responsibility. His brutality and tyranny are pointless and without cause; his acts of violence and repression against his people are reminiscent of a toddler pounding it's fists in the sand to slay a mound of ants rather than the moral sacrifices of a pragmatic ruler. He is not fit for any position of authority whether it be temporal or clerical, a trait he shares with both his predecessors."

"Long ago, there was a man of immense combat prowess who emerged victorious in many a battle. Some said his abilities were supernatural, and others that he was some kind of demon once he steps on the field. His fame and prestige grew swiftly, to the point that mere mention of his name could turn the tide of an impossible battle in his favor. But the brightest flames swiftly fade, as he soon found that enemies simply avoided facing him in combat, and instead brought ruin to his country wherever he was not. So great was his prowess that the rest of his people had begun to rely on it more than their own capabilities. These enemies also devised a way to defeat him without fighting him, and the man died in an avalanche that consumed him and most of his army. I tell this story because I see it in you. In your presence, your nation is formidable. In your absence, your nation is weak. Your nation relies on your power too much, and that will be its downfall." -Cala Vermuth Iron Tiger

"Vermouth? Like the drink? Oh wait. Vermuth. Ver-muth. Got it. Let's see...a cool-headed quasi-military commander. I don't know how competing tribespeople can cooperate in war, but then again, I'm sure you all cooperate when it comes to exterior threats.

I get the impression that you're a jack-of-all-trades yet a master of none. Buuuut on the other hand, you are fixated on perfectibility. I guess one can't be surprised by this, optimum results are required for anybody of your background, not just in day to day administration and trade but also when it comes to martial prowess. The way your strategies are described seem predictable, but then again, you Cala folk do seem to be one-man-armies so it is not like I'm comfortable making a premature assessment. I certainly don't envy your position even if I'm sure you're up to it, propping up a tribal porcupine, being ready for war to protect the peace, this and that. Necessary yes, but it must be time consuming.

From His Imperial Majesty's Personal Journal

25 June 1931

From the Imperial Palace.

My personal thoughts regarding Ansar.

"His Imperial Majesty's televised execution of a corrupt official via lynching proved to be extreme considering what followed right after. That execution did exactly what Ansar wanted: mobs of people lynching government officials 'deemed' as corrupt to them, and another word for 'deemed' is 'imagine to be'. So I believe not all of them were corrupt as imagined to be then. That is one of the exact meanings of the word 'deemed'. I think to himself, 'will Ansar have yet another official he deems to be corrupt murdered and send ordinary people into blind frenzies of lynching people they believe to be corrupt because Ansar said so? And to think he is also generous to provide cheaper shelters for his people. But nevertheless, Ansar, though I cannot overlook the fact that he is kind, his actions do not convince me that he can remain a good man if he starts making excuses for his cullings as 'anti-corruption campaigns'. I shall continue observing him after I am done writing for I must sleep."

"Eh, Empress Reo seems to lead quite an adventurous life. War upon war, she fends off the enemies of her people, fighting in the front lines among her men. I respect that. To fight among your people as their equal is the true mark of a leader. However, I must say I think power is too centralised, her nation revolves too much around herself. What would happen if she died? Would her nation, for which she fought so hard, collapse? I shudder to think that a single death could thrust thousands of people in a collective disarray. All her work undone by a single hit."

"Her tenure is rather short and thus there is not much information available to formulate an opinion on her. I suppose I can respect her ability to cross boundaries and work with rival factions for the stability of her country. There appears to be some sort of error here, however. It is claimed that she is extremely popular and will be remembered for ages and that she has overseen the recovery of her nation's economy. Given that she has only been in power for a few days, I find these claims rather questionable. Even I with all my power cannot rebuild a ruined economy and restore lost occupations overnight. Such a thing takes time to achieve, time which has not passed yet for her. Her popularity, likewise, seems suspect as she has done very little during her tenure as 'president' and I cannot fathom how she could be so popular after ruling for only a few days. The information presented is perplexing. Still, that her people apparently chose her--a concept that is still rather alien to me--must mean that she is doing something right. Perhaps it is not my place to question her popularity or success, then. As long as her people prosper and her reign is just and prosperous I cannot criticize her."

Ok so what do we have here... a king I think. Not only a king, but a king with a giant mustache and beard. Looks pretty nice. That outfit however is unfortunately not my cup of tea. Too complicated and messy. So... what did you do with your life. So in your character file I read that you directly orchestrated a wide series of reforms, which I think is kinda weird, since I'm pretty sure you have a parliament... aren't you supposed to be apolitical or something... oh well. Lets read along. So I also read here that you're actually secretly a socialist, which seems like something that will cause a lot of controversy, which is good because I controversies, especially when you get to see other people argue about it. Where was I again? Oh yeah, reading your character file. You enlisted into World War 2 because your brother died and you wanted to honor them, which in my opinion is a stupid idea because I don't think your brother wanted you to die, luckily you have a far better reason, namely because planes are cool, which I agree with. Overall your reign seems to be a bit lacking, but you have a pretty wild backstory, which is often what people say about me, so solely because of this reason, I think you're alright.

"Alright what have we got on the agenda to- a store manager?"

I feel like theirs some sort of joke in play here that I want to make but I'm just not seeing the punchline for the life of me. I'm more used to military leaders, politicians, eldritch abominations, messiahs, and the like, that something so mundane is actually pretty unique. I'll roll with it.

So Corporate hasn't swallowed your soul yet has it? admirable, futile, but admirable. I can appreciate a stiff upper lip. I can also appreciate competence, you've got a solid history, and a few rewards to match although their legitimacy is a bit shaky, but hey a reward is a reward. It's too bad you don't got my kind of strength, you could probably use it considering how your company is treating ya.

Yer honestly a story I've seen played out far too often, honest hard worker, shelved to a corporation that just doesn't give a shit.

Ye have my sympathies."

"This woman possesses great warrior prowess who is given extraordinary amount of authority, neither of which she deserves. She is a sell-sword. She fights for pride and wealth, neither of which are worth fighting for. Senseless violence and vain pursuits of hedonism mean her talents go to waste as she fights for the wealthy and privileged few who already enjoy more than what they deserve. That a country could be run by merchants, even unofficially, is a sickening idea. She is nothing but a tool for the further exploitation of the disadvantaged. Undoubtedly aware of this fact, she is apparently too selfish to be anything but indifferent to it. This is both regrettable and depressing. So much power and intellect wasted in the hands of a glorified mercenary and thug. Disgraceful."
