I mean, lasers have their place in exoatmospheric combat. I get what you mean with the dominantly soft FT you find on NS where choice of armament is mostly chopped down to flavor or polity differentiation or whatnot with the actual consequences of specific armament just pushed by narrative requirement anyway. Still, I'm personally a bit miffed in general at so many people choosing to employ lasers as their big shipkiller primary armament. Laserstars exist and all and you can do some funky things with mirror drones from what I've heard but nobody takes these things into consideration, they just slap some big turreted laser mounts on their ships so they can have a spacegun which isn't overtly just a spacegun. Gun-based KKV's seem to be a close second in terms of NS popularity but at the same time a lot of it's just the expected faux techjargon because someone read half an article claiming that railguns or coilguns are the "future of all space warfare" and so it just gets slapped as the same flavor coat on spaceships with no consideration of what this sort of gun armament even means for combat. Particle beams are somewhat eschewed but you can still find them at least in name with enough digging, usually under the Hollywood term of "ion cannon" or whatever. At least these options are preferable to face contorts into a writhing clump of flesh knobs from the sheer cuh-rynge plasma weapons.

Neo-Western East Korea wrote:

Yea, missiles are somewhat underrated though you still see them around a bit. Still, whole thing about people not considering what any type of munition means applies here. Missiles go the distance and can pack a mean punch. Issue with them is getting them to the bad guy those few hundred thousand kilometers away within a reasonable span of time and keeping those missiles intact throughout the trip. Many ways you can go around doing this, uparmoring missiles, making accommodation for some midcourse maneuver, select decoys, sheer volume of fire, in very specific scenarios low-observability; real shame how all of the intricacies go right down the gutter in 90% of cases, the things just treated as more crap to throw at the enemy the same way any other Hollywood spacegun does. I'm still rather new to all this stuff though and have a clear bias towards missiles because of my past aeronautical stuff so take this whole post with a fat grain of salt.

Long quote

So, what you are saying is its time to introduce some Treasure Planet style of naval warfare with space faring age of sail style warships? Cause I think that would funny and pretty neat to see when it comes to FT, in the meantime, I will still with my massive kinetic naval guns with massive, rimmed ammunition.

Treasure Planet was the shit :handshake:. Space sailships (excl. solar/laser/particle beam sails and all that yadda yadda) done in a self-aware manner have a lot of potential, considering you're already at that point where you can handwave-in whatever you want for your tech/combat system. From there it's just making something engaging, internal consistency helps too. I've seen it done one time on NS and that's about it.

Talking about FT dichés, I've seen most Future Tech armies using the same weapons from Halo, Call of Duty of the futuristic kind, Star Wars, Warhammer 40,000 and so on. People don't take a lot of inspiration from the Dune series.

In the Dune universe, people fight their wars using swords. Before you ask, yes, lasguns are a thing in Dune but they are seldom used since defensive shields are also a thing. Shoot a lasgun beam at a person who is wearing a shield and kaboom you are now atomic bomb.

The reason Dune works as well as it does within its own universe is by the technology of the shields which were built directly into the worldbuilding. Swords and other melee weapons are possible in a FT RP, heck I've even used them in some stories I've done, but by having it be a critical part of one's military requires that others in the RP play along with it, while also requiring a bit more suspension of disbelief if any sort of projectile weapon is used.

If a melee weapons is used as a large part of one's military, immediate questions must be answered. This isn't inherently a conflict between hard and soft sci-fi, just an aid to the suspension of disbelief. What happened if the enemy brings a gun? Why don't your guys bring a gun? If the reason for you not using them IC is traditional, as I would expect, who gets what? What stops the enemy from bringing a space flamethrower and ruining your plans? You could go Dune and use personal fields, or Star Wars and have the main melee users have space magic, or something along those lines. Personally, I use the various examples cyberpunk offers as inspiration. The guy can't hurt you if you've got tech in your head that lets you react faster than he can pull the trigger.

You definitely got a point there, sword fighting is pretty Duan anachronistic in a setting where it is most common to see, y'know, laser guns and an egregious pay to win system.

But you and others keep giving me ideas and that's what matters to me most of the time.

the amount of times I've seen Halo weapons on NS is just depressing at this point doesn't dune require melee combat, that's probably why no one cares to look at it + it's not a setting known for it's weaponry
