"Ah, Kresge. I've hardly had the chance to properly interact with him, but he's seemed like a rather amiable person. Similar to me in a few facets, largely in terms of us both having high levels of combat experience and ability. While I doubt I'd be able to win against him...at least easily or without pushing myself to the brink, we're at the very least somewhere in the same ballpark. Though the magical ability thing falls more in line with some of my friends than myself, despite my newly acquired power. Considering how little he cares for politics, I can hardly judge him for his beliefs."

You might talk the talk, your majesty, but there's more to a revolution than speeches. There comes a point where you have to climb down from your ivory tower and help the people out of the mud. That means getting dirty - putting in real work towards the complete reorganization of your nation - something you cannot do so long as you keep calling yourself King. "See? I admire socialism and its principles... but its practice has been so disputed no one knows how it is actually done and every man claims he is doing it right. Still, I see in the Marshal's eyes that revolutionary fire like one in the early of the twentieth century -- idealistic and filled with dreams, yet it has to be built upon a fiery hatred for everything else on the opposite side. Do not worry, however. I myself also confess to this hatred. How else are we going to fight without hating our enemies to the bones? We are fortunately not enemies -- or at least I do not assign you as my enemy. We agree on the principles of equality, civil rights and patriotism while we both also detest imperialism and religious control. That is already a fair term. "Always curious, it is, when a human honestly believes they are personally enriched by tyrannically lording over poor and miserable peasants, as compared to being the first among equals of prosperous citizens. Curious, and sad. Often I have pondered, how can I teach them, how can I show them beyond all shadow of a doubt, that this is quite simply not the case? What, I wonder, causes this horrible and greatly suffering-inducing delusion in the first place?"

-- The empress (and former as well as, if she ever wakes from her deep stasis, presumptive returning future, princeps) of Yirophia, if she could consciously observe and express an opinion on the subject matter. Birth name not given nor known as per tradition.

"Alright, this is getting out of hand. This is the third blank dossier already. Void, this one doesn't even have a name attached. Empress indeed. I suggest reassigning some diagnostic routines to the filing system - either something's malfunctioned somewhere, or we've got rulers the omniverse over being selectively erased from reality. The latter case carries implications that are understandably troubling. Have this sorted as soon as possible."
