After several years on the NS forums, I'd say that I'm a bit familiar with some cliches which includes: Middle Eastern or Middle Eastern-esque nations with a Khan surname in their characters, alt Germany's (seen a few), and what appears to be a common occurrence these days, "X is looking for Y spouse"/"X is married to Y" threads, usually underdone and very lackluster in terms of RP..

We don't talk about marriage RP's here. Did once and it turned into a shitshow which I personally don't want to talk about Literally nothing. In many ways, it's worse than any other shotgun, because it's not actually finished - it's stuck as a prototype. People genuinely only put it in media because it looks vaguely Sci-Fi and futuristic.

None of my characters are mentally stable 🤪 . It's definitely a cliché for me, although there are NS leaders who are absolutely off-the-walls nuts.

WF crazy: Traumatized, broken individuals struggling to deal with the hardships in their lives who may or may not behave erratically. They could be aggressive, jaded, or just downright sad. They panic easily (read: all the time), likely because I panic easily and can therefore make a character panic in a pinch. They could have any combination of anxiety, depression, and PTSD, depending on their situations and how I feel like writing them. I might try to write humorous characters at times, but I find it easier to write with more serious undertones.

NS leader crazy: A young, batsh*t person who should be seeking professional help in an institution instead of leading a revolution or other sort of movement/cult that revolves around a completely insane ideology and/or religion. They could be magical or simply a psychopath, depending on the level of tech or magic in the nation, and likely have a distinct aesthetic as well as insanely well-coded factbooks. They've usually garnered enough of a reputation on F7 that many people recognize who they are, and everyone knows they've completely lost it.

I actually wonder if Lavinia or Heilgard fit your description... Actually Lavinia did try to seek help in professional institution to little to no effect...

Quite frankly, I'm not sure under which variant of mentally unstable Yunru could fit in out of all the ones you've described. Like... she is young and should be seeking professional help in an institution (although tbf, I'm pretty sure that pretty much every single institution has already collapsed in her world) instead of leading the Paramilitary, which I'm pretty sure by this point is just a mere extension of her own person due to how much she's fucked up its power structure to be from "everyone is roughly equal, barring necessary differences" to "everything is centered around me, and me only, no exceptions".

But at the same time, I'm not sure if she could be considered broken as a result of a combination of stress (from walking across the entirety of Siberia and sailing through the Bering Strait after having the lab she was in be invaded by the Russians and from, really, having to lead the Paramilitary methinks) and a flood of (paranoid, now that I think about it) questions taking over her mind throughout all of this.

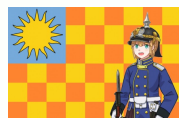

In other words, my brain's too small to even try and categorize whatever kinda person I've written up in the first place. And at this point, you might as well consider it a cliché I fall under, simply because, well, I have no other characters so far. I do plan on writing more, though, so... we'll see, I guess.

My characters aren't insane, it's just having gone through pretty dark moments in their past and now dealing with everything years later has interesting effects. I'm writing my RP stories in a sort of alternating way, between past and present
