I hardly doubt that the TAT of now would be anything remotely similar to the TAT of 12,000 years. It's just a matter of plain realism, really - while your nation may have existed in name ever since 12,000 B.C., denying any sort of difference between TAT of now and TAT of 12,000 when it comes to society, political and societal organization, etc, is not a good idea.

I get where you are going now and it makes sense because we are indeed different, but I never denied anything since a predecessor usually is a separate nation that preceded another nation, so that statement is false.

The Prime Minister has got some weird quirks and even weirder if she exists in our world. To start with; she likes playing turn-based video games, likes to "play the kazoo", openly hates pineapple pizza, has heterochromia, and her adoptive parents were lesbians. All of that would be a "first" in the history of politics.

The Troubles still happened where native Rosarian culture gets suppressed by the now-independent government and armed conflict ensued. Which only ended in 1962 where it killed 750,000 people.

The Darwintherium is one of the many species of animal beings that inhabit the Dystopia. This species, in particular, can grow quite massive, reaching up to 1.8 meters (around 20cm more than the average human). Interestingly, males lack horns, but females have horns.
