"While secrecy is normally a commodity and a charm, this man is on the verge of Big Brother's secrecy, which strikes me as part paranoia and part cowardice. Moreover, I have no compliment to a crime syndicate in general, regardless of what power or magic they hold and what ridiculous names or unique demeanours they have. True that such degree of criminality might be the product of a corrupt state, since I see that even a former policeman has abandoned the side of the law to them -- it is a shame, is it not? But in the very end, they will never be redeemed in my eyes."

Regarding Reichskanzler von Hartmann

"The Reichskanzler's pragmatic leadership is lucky to have lasted. He is fortunate enough to not live in a time of dire strife and civil unrest. If he ruled in the era of Weimar, he'd be strung up on the street. Libertarian socialistic policies combined with light-handedness in the German economy is a collapse waiting to happen as soon as disaster hits. I would not want a weak-willed leader like the Reichskanzler at the helm of anything as important as Germany once the going gets tough, and the situation gets radical. Fortunately, Herr Friedrich V is more capable."

With foreign relations being near-zilch, in a global community where the world sees that the Allies have won the war, will she ever look beyond a policy of survival? "[Reichspräsident Reitsch] faces her own problems within her own state, in addition to the various challenges in international relations that her country needs to face. A seemingly unshakeable national unity, taken from Hitler's 12 year rule, has seemed to disappear in thin air in mainland Germany in its citizens. While she administers over military men whom have served Hitler, who may not say that this remaining national unity may devolve into power struggles within months?"

"Dear heavens above, what a feral man. Have you ever drawn the line when it comes to morality in politics? Oh, who am I kidding? Of course, you haven't.

I truly can't seem to find anything to admire about you, Mr Bush. When people mention the rotten core of a state, I'll point them to you as an example. Not only have you been a malicious force around your homeland, but you've also destroyed the lives of many individuals in the continent of South America thanks to your propping up of the drug trade for what?! Why?! Have you no shame? You have innocent blood on your hands, you repulsive reprobate.

What is going on in that head of yours? When will you tire? When will you start to realize that the misery and suffering you've unleashed upon the world is too much? Simply put, I'm shocked and appalled by the existence of such a being like yourself. However, I do not hate you. I pity you. Regarding Countess von Carstein

"As much as it is less idealic to have a Statesmen who's talents extend only through the art of seduction, coming from my own mouth it would mean little. Regardless, von Carstein is a more favourable leader, even if 'rough around the edges'. Her empowerment of the youth and mainstream appeal is a viable political tactic we should imitate in the coming age. If not myself, I certainly expect Haudegen to foster our own 'Ambrosia' who will oppose the paranoid anarchist of Bloodshade while retaining the allure that young voters simply cannot refuse."

Personally I would never agree with Hanna anything other than this: that so-called 'Great German Empire' should see a change in its system, not in the way Hanna would suggest, having a despot holding the title of 'Emperor' alone is a problem still, that is a better suited representation of the entire nation, not some so-called 'pragmatic' fool who serves a pretentious emperor."
