overwhelming, but that's just me.

Well you see.

The issue with your assumption that several-paragraph-long responses can be overwhelming is rooted in the fact that such effort-posters occasionally supremacists who look upon posters like worms. Now while I will admit that such posters do exist, there are multiple factors that go into it and I, personally, can safely say that the majority of posters who frequently post multi-paragraph posts are actually quite approachable and will not hate you for giving them a 'regular' reply. In fact, I am willing to say they'd much rather have a person like you replying to them than a person like Kannadrickium (which, while he is DOS, perfectly fits my example of a low-tier poster - which is to say someone who frequently posts without regards for quality, length, or even the enjoyment of the reader, selfishly making F7 their game rather than a fun experience for everyone.)

As an example, I personally do not really care who replies to me so long as they give a response that shows a minimum understanding of what the particular F7 thread is about and - if applicable - a minimum understanding of what my nation/character is like. Which is to say, they realize that Wexas is a monarchy that - while it takes place centuries into the future - primarily uses technology from long before. So, posters like you are perfectly fine in my book. You just lost the game. So I, personally, find it quite unfortunate that you find posts with multiple paragraphs to be intimidating because I personally realize that the majority of those who do post such responses just wanna have fun and are mostly okay with whatever they get in response. However, I do recognize where the fear comes from, and I do not look down upon you for having such emotions.

i feel unenlightened by not knowing who sen is, but honestly that sort of maggyvering just comes off as cool, tbh. and that "no ftl" guideline is... kind of cheeky, i gotta say, considering that my most ft setting has had hardly any technological advancement that we can't theorize today besides ftl.

Sometimes it happens in threads where you can add a few lines, but don't need to go into massive detail--the news thread, for instance. I'm fine with a few paragraphs in general, of course, but maybe I just feel like...not all F7 threads require the same amount of effort as others, if that makes sense.

Mm, that's a good point, and one that I try to take into account and maybe should check myself on. I often find myself writing more than I mean to, so I try to remember not to expect the same from everyone. The "which party would you vote for" threads, for instance. I answer IC with complete sentences, but I don't ever expect anyone else to, and I hope people know they can just say "Labor" or "Green" in response to me, and it being alright.

It's really not length that bothers me in terms of "bad cliches," but when a lack of effort seems palpable. Folks saying they'd vote for either the Lotuses or the NewCons, for example, not realizing that despite their names the parties almost couldn't be more different. Speaking of that, that's an unfortunate cliché as well. Many users being Americans means trying to use non-mainstream-American-meanings of political words tends to trip people up as they can't understand why the Liberal Party is actually the kinda conservative one. Like, I don't want to blame folks too much, because it's often what they've been unwittingly inundated with, but still turns into sort of a cliché...

That will never happen it's easier to write about slamming stat blocks against each other than it is to write about creative unconventional warfare tactics. Even though the latter is significantly more fun.
