I think I would enjoy war RPs that are focused on a character's perspective, where you don't really write a whole essay about your tanks and equipment, rather you write about what the soldier is going through, what he sees and what not. Like a story and not some weird competitive game about 'well my stuff does this' and 'my stuff does this to counter your stuff'

I think this is a bit of a flaw / cliché-ish thing I see with some of the nations I have seen around.

Doing one thing, usually being progressive, doesn't mean that a nation can start bombing or invading another country just because they feel that the progressive / positivity balanced out the bad deeds. In other words, you will still be known as a pro-LGBT+ nation who bombed the hell out of a less fortunate country.

It doesn't work like that, in my opinion. You either do all good deeds while trying your best to minimize the bad ones, or just be known as an international menace regardless of your culture.

I want to note that this is in no way targeting any nation or user in particular. Perhaps it is just something I have observed.

This is the best way to write war RPs. Focus on a few characters on the ground and for big picture strategy stuff maybe focus on a general's perspective rather than just begin some omnipotent being akin to the player in EU4 directing your nation to send troops and fighter jets to places.

There's not much point in doing funny violations of international law during wartime if it [a] fails to succeed in a vaguely strategic objective in accordance to the overarching plan of your IC govt. and [b] doesn't take into account basic logistics and feasible military technology. Otherwise you're just doing warcrime for the sake of warcrime, and that's dumb.

The worst part is just hastily improvised genocides that are carried out for no apparent reason... people do know that this shit requires a lot of resources, organisation, logistics, for very little practical gain, right? In fact, it actively hampers your effort as the resisting civilian population feels they have nothing to lose.

I was thinking ... we always used the RP one-liners example. But what about the crises that take place exclusively with IC letters? They occur especially in the case of:

- 1) yet another slave market that is opened.
- 2) yet another persecution of the LGBT community.
- 3) yet another persecution of religious communities (especially if carried out by communist governments).

I also note that some nations tend to hit the same nail with regard to their internal problems and seem made only to trigger the reaction of the international community.

Il thing again, but when countries can literally mobilize 100% of their reserves (obviously without any popular objection) and arrive at a budding flashpoint zone within minutes of some stupid shit occurring somewhere, without even a by your leave or an ultimatum issued to the faulting nation. Like, yet another country starts oppressing Christians, and then this rando nation has already reached its coasts and is shelling the capital without even issuing an ultimatum to cease this oppression or whatever.

Godmodding is a cliché. But what's also a cliché is people who like to try to make their nation impenetrable through conventional means. In other words, they do so much research, testing, and development that they functionally cannot accept losses because they've always got an excuse for why they would win in any situation because "I'm so smart and I'm never going to lose or mess up in any way!" If anything, I find these people less palatable than godmodders: these people maintain a façade of effortposting, so you can't call them out on their bullshit without everyone coming to their defense. You may say "but if they did that much research, they deserve to win!" Well, half the time their conclusions are wrong and they should be much weaker than they say they are. And secondly, they're just godmodding and refusing to take losses under the concept of "doing their research," even if said research has flaws.

It's just an arms race at that point.

If the numbers count reservists or those who are conscripted for a year or two and are free to lead civilian lives most of the time, I think that is valid.

Of course, I am aware that these figures are for permanent military staff, in which case yeah, it will implode harder than an unstable star.

Down below is less of an argument against you, and more of trivia:

In Singapore's case, this is what I can find from Wikipedia: It has an approximate active strength of around 72,000 personnel and is capable of mobilising over a million reservists \(also known as National Servicemen, or NSmen\) in case of national exigencies or full-scale war. Reservists make up more than 80% of its military defence system and form the backbone of the SAF. I would have used this as a source, but it feels like the numbers are a bit off. I am certain that there are more for Singapore's case (252,500 as stated in Wiki, versus the "over a million").

We have 5.704 million people as of last year's census, so that is 1.262% of population in active numbers, and at least 17% of them being reservists.

Of course, there are other factors, and truth be told, this is just a simple Google search instead of deeper research into the exact numbers. Case in point and to make it shorter and stop beating around the bush, I concur with your statement. North Korea is a bit screwed up: [Their] military is the world's fourth largest, with nearly 1.3 million active personnel, accounting for about 5 percent of the total population. More than 600,000 others serve as reserve soldiers. And think that this is North Korea, and their 5% of total pop in the active military duty is already screwing them over. 10% is going to be hell.

I can also put Napoleon on the Throne of France and avenge Waterloo in 1940, so it must've been realistic IRL too!

HOI4 and its consequences have been a disaster for anyone interested in the mildest touch of military realism.
