Other countries fall outside our jurisdiction and Tangatarehua strongly supports the rights of other nations to their national sovereignty - and therefore would never condemn another nation based on its ideology, unless directly provoked.

So, not a crime.

Eating a deceased relative who stipulated clearly in their will that they wished to be eaten upon their death?

lashes from a zeruel strips followed by execution via firing squad. If it's an endangered species from any other world, no punishment; in fact, it would be encouraged to make way for tabulon settlements.

Shooting someone once to death, but then proceeding to shoot the dead body four more times. Also, the weather would be extremely hot during the crime, possibly causing fatigue. In addition, the victim attempted to attack the shooter with a knife.

In theory you could be fined up to K50,000,000 (NSD$250,000) or go to jail for five years, although this is rarely if ever enforced. It's also more likely that a serial pirate would be extradited to the country of the copyright holder and forced to face charges there.

Depends on a host of other criteria, but the harshest (and obviously rarest) punishment will be a court-martial, a dishonorable discharge, and likely a hanging.

Potentially life in prison, failing that you'd have five years just for possessing a knife in public, plus fifteen to twenty years for the stabbing. So minimum 20 years, maximum life.

If the animals are all native to Telbnis, it wouldn't be a crime. If any of the animals set free weren't native, you would face 2-4 years in prison for endangering the environment or mild bioterrorism.
