Wonderful people. Made me realize how ineffective Unit 731 would've been in any country with actual sanitary infrastructure.

There's something I still haven't figured by reading there, related to what you describe as "semi-post-apocalyptic". I don't know what's the limit for a survivable WW3, something I too want to integrate in Las Palmeras, maybe. It's established that a nuclear war in 1962 during the Cuban Missile Crisis would be pretty one-sided in favor of the USA, but that one in 1973's Yom Kippur would've been closer to MAD. ...but I'm stumped at finding a middle ground.

Cliche: somebody calling anything that is remotely authoritarian "fascist," even though that is not the case. Fascism is an extreme type of authoritarianism; not all authoritarian actions, policies, or politicians are automatically fascist.

I also see the word "nationalism" being used liberally, sometimes when the word "patriotism" would suffice. Again, the two are not interchangeable, and nationalism is patriotism with extra military steps.

I'm not disagreeing, but you're asking far too much of your educational system.

It depends on how those words are used and how they are being defined. Like communist use the word differently than liberal and so on.

This gives an good insight about how the word centrist and fascist are used sometimes.

Not being in any NS alliance at all is the most based alliance.

I mean eh. NS alliances are great if they remain small, IMO. Large and professionally done alliances are okay but not really for me. Really though I see a lot of the time alliances (such as, famously, SACTO) end up becoming wankfests that jump on single nations, meaning that small-yet-open concepts inevitably develop into massive wars or just curbstomps.

I would say I'm guilty of this but the guy in question was questioned and affirmed that he was okay with it beforehand, so.

To me joining an alliance makes me feel like I would have to devote more time and effort to NS than I really want to. That and well, I don't want to get into massive superpower wars that devolve into one lining text based Hol4.

I mean really if you're getting into alliance wars that end up with one line hoi4-tier nonsense then you're either in the wrong alliances or the wrong threads. That said I understand entirely why you don't want to devote that much time in NS -- but alliances nevertheless can let you flesh out your nation internationally. It's also cool if alliances exist for purposes such as economic/diplomatic RP rather than merely war.

I've just realised that the alliance I'm in, the Eurasian Strategic Co-Operation Bloc (ESCB), is four-letter. Might have to change that to EASCB.

Eh, don't wanna be threadjacking, but I'd really enjoy joining a good alliance. One where the guys don't wage war on each other extremely trigger-happily.

Speaking of cliches, had anyone mentioned absurd military vehicles or doctrines? Laka has one: a suicidal last stand that will turn the country (and a large part of the world) into a barely inhabitable irradiated wasteland with an enormous chemical and biological fallout after using a shit ton of WMDs on our own soil.
