Does a rock know it's a rock? Obviously it cannot. Does this mean it cannot be a rock, since it doesn't identify itself as one? The correct formulation of "this is a rock" would be "many people would call this entity a rock". Identity is essentially subjective - a instance is assigned an identity based on how closely it corresponds to the observer's mental model of an ideal instance of whatever entity (their schema of that thing, in technical terms). Identity is not inherent in an object, but rather arises by observation (observation being always a process). It is much more useful to state who considers what which than to outright claim that the what is a which.
