"A product of war, and nothing but mindless warfare. A machine in the flesh that just marches for the next fight with the next big opposition until that opposition gets big enough to knock them down and permanently too. I can see them being either a gain or a bane on my get-rich-quick schemes. I could hire them out if they do such things, which is doubtful. But never hurts to hire and use them as my little private army and take out rival countries once I undermined their laughable securities to prevent an economic and plunder them for whatever they have, and perhaps if they are worth maintaining. I'll put that nation as a mining colony under direct Ministry control and have the Tundrans rough up any larping "resistance" fighters refusing to embrace the fruits of being subjugated by the Alkdorian Empire. Hmm, yes, maybe... This could be manifested but overall my take on the War Hound is neutral as I don't know how useful he would be to my interests."

"I've learned that anyone who goes by the name 'slick' is not to be trusted. I look at Arthur's profile and find that rule is borne through in the most emphatic manner. I have a hard time deciding whether he would be a good fit among our kind, or if he would not make it three hours before he gets winged. I think the answer depends on which tribe he encounters first. Maybe among the Deepies, he'd be fine. If the Iron Tigers were his introduction, they wouldn't do him the honor of a ceremonial execution. He'd just be on a pike. If I see the guy, I'd probably shoot him." -Cala Granes Wavetrasher, surprisingly nonplussed

"Another human wearing antiquated armor and antiquated blades calling themselves the peak of cunning, planning, and skill. It is sad how quickly this has been a trope for our kind to see out of man, what with their interesting social tendencies. Supposedly they speak of surpassing quite frankly impossible odds on the battlefield, which some of our logisticians have deduced is mathematically improbable at best, and all of them hold an air of superiority about themselves that leaves us retching and gasping for air. At least the other monarchs we have met have kept an air of respect and honor around themselves, while this... family? To be frank, we don't quite understand the connections between these various leaders, other than that this 'War Hound' sits on top. But nonetheless, this family spits in the face of even the slightest bit of self restraint in favor of cladding themselves in wretched constructs, and decorating their locals with macabre decor. We have a similar problem in our lands with a neighboring species, but at least they learned not to form a country with it.

We have little else to say really, these armored over glorified generals have backwards tactics based around dated concepts of holding the line at all costs, and defending to your dying breaths, and we don't think they would stand much a chance against any logical military force. It is truly sad to see not only the corrupt power of dictatorship, but having it mixed with the horrific gore and air of murder."

"I like her - I see a lot of myself reflected in her. Life determined by the status of our parentage; mine as a royal, and hers as military. Joined the military out of dissatisfaction with our lives and the desire to use it to follow the footsteps of our parents - I joined the KVDI to learn discipline for my father's position, she took an officer commission to follow her mother. She's built an astoundingly successful career out of what mediocrity she had and I like that strength; even with all my inherent advantages, I never had that strength, I've only ever 'made do' and I still am 'making do'."

"As much as I wish I could learn more about her, I physically can't, because her liquid flashbang hair dye left me blind and feeling for a seeing stick. Her hair can't get any whiter; I hope her bodyguards keep her away from bright lights and reflective surfaces."

The Empire will give its full support to all participating factions that are dedicated to ensuring the destruction of this so-called "Brotherhood of Nod" as it has been determined. If they succeed in their goals, they will come for the Empire and other countries of this endless realm we share. Well, it is, isn't it? I don't think the Amazons have to ward off invasions in this day and age; considering their culture is geared towards martial values, I have no doubt they'd be formidable, it's in the not-so-mythical name; and the Queen would lead on to the best of her ability, I'm sure, even if I'm stumped over what administrative style of governance she has, apart from maintain tradition. But as the role of an enforcer I can already tell she is much more than a simple soldier as the list of duty is admirable.

Lastly I must ask her, does she have any good suggestions for a bite to eat, discussion between the fallen lords has had my stomach confused and curious towards the various foods they have out there. And she seems to have good taste."

The camera focuses on a rusty and decrepit white 2001 Ford Fiesta, a burgundy 2006 Ford Crown Victoria, a blue 2006 Vauxhall Vectra VXR, and a desk chair with a Toyota logo and a two photocopied on it

Jeremy: "For us to review. Now, before we begin with today's 'Grand Trip', I would like to inform our audience that today's episode is completely unscripted, and trust me, it won't be like the last time - James, I believe you've got a piece of news for us?"

James, sighing: "Great news!"

Jeremy: "Is it a new Dacia?"

James: "I wish! The 'nation' of Low Bloods has a new leader, you take a look at this nonsense, Clarkson!"

James passes the sheet with the news to Jeremy, who grabs it while he puts on his eyeglasses

Jeremy: "Okay, let's see what we've got... So, apparently, this man earned leadership of his nation by killing the old 'King of Corpse'. Am I getting this right?"

James: "Yes, apparently it's some sort of tradition over there"

Jeremy: "Umm, they must be some kind of tribal nation... Or middle eastern... Or Burmese - Anyway, here it also says that he grew in a middle-class neighborhood"

James: "Yes...?"

Jeremy: "And then it says here that his mother turned into a beast, his father killed himself, his mother got hunted to death, he got depressed, got into some sort of jail/orphanage, met some other kid with horns, sprouted a revolution, got arrested, got experimented on, escaped, and then turned into the King"

Richard: "Well, I apologize for sounding skeptic, but that sounds like total rubbish"

Jeremy: "Richard, because it probably is. There is no way in hell a chain of events as convoluted as this could possibly ever happen, even in an alternate timeline with magic and some other fictitious rubbish like that"

James: "Jeremy, have you even heard of the multiverse theory?"

Jeremy: "Yes I have and I think it's total bollocks"

"The Council has waited patiently for our opportunity to discuss our opinions on the childlike Emperor who calls himself Charles, as he has done to us in the past. Though we will elaborate why shortly, we must confess, the thought of executing this Imperial dog as we have our own makes the council very satisfied. They embody every disgusting trait that lone leaders seem to embody; a disgusting fascination with the act of war, but only if that allows them to be seated in the back, a case of suppression and anger on those 'below' them from an early stage of life, an insistence on choosing relationships based on polity rather than connections, and a quite tacky waste of a nation's wealth for the sake of personal egotistical inflation.

He supposedly calls for the civil rights of his people, calling them the leaders of their country, and yet he still sits on a throne of privilege, and consumes their taxes in fancy banquets and elaborate clothing. At least the maniacal Dictators and Despots of these many realms have the power to stand up and lead their nations, but monarchs see fit to tell the people they are in control, while sipping down their work from a throne of death. If he truly wishes to see his people the leaders of his nation, he should remove himself from it, and quit wasting its peoples efforts. Bloodlines do not last forever, but the beating heart of a race of sentients can survive with many. To say that one vein in the body has the right to rule the others is idiotic, and even if it may be important, giving it control and priority over others is a backwards way to build a body. This is why monarchies must be decimated, no matter how much they try to mark themselves as benevolent to their people.

Other than that, we have little to say. This Emperor sticks his nose into truly democratic nations as if he should have a say, he likely plays with dolls in his bed, mind consumed with the inane concept of men and women fighting and dying for the sake of nation, and overall, reminds even our youngest councilmen of a petulant schoolboy with an overly wealthy parent. The world would be better off with less Charles Von Rolands."

"As the council has already given their opinions on Ennio, I've chosen to stand alone to give my personal opinions on the man. In my ninety five years of life I have seen many men, of Rulzean stock, or of many other races, raised in lower status grow up to be calloused, manipulative, and generally negative on those around them. To be honest, I was one of them myself, and it is sad to see people in similar situations turning out to grow rotten. But then there are some like Ennio who use their experience to become leaders of good. They use their experience in how to be vocal to lead people to greatness, they use their experience of rock bottom to teach people how to reach for the stars, they learn that being tough in words does not make you tough in kindness. My name may not be prolific in the council I lead, really, my biography has not yet even been written, but I appreciate someone like Ennio can lead their people as I try to lead my own."

"What do we have here...oh? a 'Communal Republic'? well you certainly remind me of a certain Soviet State..with a government system only fit for that of Corrupt and Degenerate Oligarchs..

You really think you 'Serve the People' with your pathetic Council? Because you never have done anything of the sort. Hell i never even heard of Policies that your petty gathering has done to its people..Mock at me all you want, but remember this..

Your equal division of power will be your inevitable downfall... I would personally be playing the Harp if i see your nation destroy itself from within.

With utter Disrespect: From me.."
