"President Ekhon Numik, this fascist piece of shit is someone, who represents everything we all have pledged to stand and fight agaisnt! The ones like him, have destroyed Enthorea, our former country! Great and unique culture and science, a possible unique civilization has been utterly annihilated by those like him! Now, we have adopted warrior culture, so we will stand together against the tyrants like him! One day, we shall rally the warbands and raid his country, slay his goons, free the slaves and pillage every house of every oligarch! And slaughter every single slaver! And I will be fighting side by side with my fellow men, when this happens. As for him, he will beg for mercy, but the justice will be served. We are Skyhooked - the bastion of freedom and we gonna be the boogeyman, that keeps tyrants awake at night!"-Overboss Shawn Bjomson

"I respect Ari as a fellow warrior, but if ya' ask me, her views about settled societies are... a lil' bit extreme. There are many good things in both worlds, and it wouldn't hurt, if she was more open minded about the ideas of others. Our cities are rich and our cushions are soft, but I hope, she and her men will not raid them. Because if she does, the people will have no other choice but to defend themselves and this will make us enemies. But unless she tries to raid our country, it's possible for us to arrange something."-Shawn Bjomson

"A man of both indulgence and devotion. The devotion is admirable. The indulgence is pitiable. A man of such strength is in many ways an ideal to aspire to for those who labour in the workshops and the greenhouses and the mines, but such luxuries as cannabis are items we cannot afford. His anger is also unfortunate. When I look upon this so-called Overboss, I see a contradiction of traits. But it is for the best that those like he have been cast out. A man such as this would have joined if not rallied the lonemen, and I have no doubt he would revile what life we have resurrected from the cold for our differing principles on freedom and duty."

There is no time for frivolity in such conditions, and as such his devotion to order is understandable as he seeks to secure the safety of the people under his guidance. "So this is the man in charge of the greatest land on Earth. I must say, I am not impressed. His accomplishments are surely great to his people, but I am not easily impressed by such things, especially in the light of his treatment of foreign faiths and cultures. I understand it is the Middle Kingdom's way to maintain its cultural homogeneity, but I cannot help but feel that if my people were to fall under his aegis we would soon cease to be. And that makes him an enemy."

We even traded in your crown to him. Yknow, I heard he actually become the leader of his own nation! He just wore the crown, and found this really big chair, and sat in it. I've often questioned whether the executions I ordain are worthwhile. Whether the fear and catharsis they generate are worth the cost of a man's life. I've decided they are. I could kill a man. I could kill a hundred men if I had to. But thousands? Millions? For what? How can someone stand amidst so many graves and not question themselves? But, at the same time, he lives in a world harsh beyond belief, and faces threats I could not imagine. I remember my ninth winter, when we were snowed in at our campsite for two weeks. "At first, I could not possibly fathom the illogical, half-hearted, and weak-willed policies that Larson has enacted. But as I look more into this, I have found the root cause, and it is the deepest possible corruption of everything that a civilization is built upon. Larson was elected, not born into her role as leader. She is plebeian, elected by populism. Therein lies every fault about her, faults that I cannot overlook. No real leader should be giving away money to plebeians, withdrawing from a warzone, nor forsaking important military allies as Larson has. I would advise anyone else to tread carefully around this dangerous, populist sham."

It means I'm busy typing up a response that could take a couple of minutes, and I don't want to deal with ninjas. I am not the first in this thread to call dibs, nor do I expect I will be the last.

BN gets the idea. Why couldn't you?

EDIT: Yes, I am frustrated by ninjas, in part because I can't see them coming, and I pride myself on making at least decent posts, which requires time to invest in reading the factbook and thinking of a decent, in-character response. You on the other hand could easily see that I had claimed dibs, yet at the time chose to not observe it. There is a world of difference there.

"The only thing I find agreeable in him is the shared hate to the Red Menace. Otherwise, he is a brutal dictator that should be deposed as soon as possible!"

"Goodness, the picture of this 'Supreme Lord' reminds me greatly of Shrek, I used to watch it when I was little, gave me some laughs here and there. Anyhow, while I rationally detested the Farquard from the movie itself, this one however seems to be much more of a genocidal, overall brutal and despicable character! I could already see the dark ages of the future human civilisation under his dictatorial rule, it would certainly be an awful era to live in"

"While I am a little surprised that it took Nacrad a really long while to address the issue of slavery, Mr Smith however deserves all the praise for finally bringing it to an end without any hesitation. While he is a remarkable statesman in general, I hope that the trend of his exemplary feats will not cease to exist anytime soon, for promising leaders do not usually appear like Christmas gifts"

"This Victoria has the attitude and perseverance needed to truly succeed in this world, and I respect her greatly for it. Though her personality is one that most would find prickly, I find her insults and disdainful attitude to be quite humorous. Though it's likely that I would brutally murder her if she spoke to me that way, she'd certainly make an interesting conversation partner. Much like Mark did, but without the combination of unspoken romantic tension and absolute loathing between the two of us."

"He's a bright fellow, but his policies are... not very nice. I suppose with all of the threats to reality itself that their multiverse faces that their militarism and expansionism is justified, but can't they see a more peaceful way to go about it? My experience demonstrates to me that kind and true words can often be more powerful than guns and gung-ho. I would be quite amenable to teaching him how to go about it. How might he react to knowing that The Cult has pacified galaxy-spanning warmongering dictatorship-states to the point of peaceful annexation, using words alone?"

"Alexandra and her nation are both well-adjusted entities that complement one another very well enough. It is always a good thing to have an intellectual lead a nation with a storied past, as such things generally tend to only be deserving of highly qualified leadership, along with straight democracy. I can see how their people led to the creation of one of the freest and most prosperous nations on their planet, the one they call America."

"Well hello there, sir! I have to admit that I'm not entirely certain what to think of you and your ilk, as I'm simply at a loss to understand why people would look forward to death in such a manner. I do however have some level of respect for your use of less visible assets in attempting to achieve your ends, and I do agree with your position that fighting should not be the first step in an interaction. Be that as it may, I suspect it would be best if we never met in person. I know a threat when I see one, and though you are not primarily a warrior, your threat is grave indeed." -KazRamael
