Because automatization and hypermilitarization. Also the main purpose of having two carriers is for terrorizing the colonies when they rebell.

what how
how do you afford them
how do you man them
how do you keep them afloat
how do you have colonies
what is the population of your colonies
what is your gdp
your nation has two million people how is it possible that it can afford to run a tenth as many carriers as the world's largest military and economy when it is so miniscule and don't say "automatization" (also automation) because that doesn't justify how you came into possession of carriers in the first place

further point of order, you said colonies how do you maintain colonies when your population is, again, a fifth the size of belgium
the only other similarly sized nation that maintained any sort of colonies iirc was actually belgium in the 1890s with the congo free state, and it only did that through an insane amount of political maneuvering and repression of the native populace to a scale that in the reign of leopold ii alone led to more than 12 million natives' deaths that was also its only colony

also how do you have colonies in the modern day did decolonization just not happen for you or something

Yes because a singular example surely can outweigh dozens of drones shot down by our nation in Syria.

Evidently, the Russian military sees value in armed drones. Not a great investment if they believe they are easily defeated by the weapons they already have. They also rushed a new top attack protection kit into service for their tanks just months after hundreds of Russian made tanks were blown up by Turkish made drones with top-attack weapons, the same drones which are now being sold to countries whose history with Russia is troubled.

Второе логичное объяснение - защита от крышебойных боеприпасов, наличие которой стала наиболее очевидной в ходе анализа боевых действий в Нагорном Карабахе осенью прошлого года. Если это так, то нужно отметить крайне высокую скорость реализации мероприятия, не типичную для современного российского военно-бюрократического аппарата. На фото видно, что сверху на ферменные конструкции уложены какие-то маты с неизвестным наполнителем. Они должны быть вполне эффективны для преждевременной инициации взрывателя крышебоа. А расстояние от «зонтика» до корпуса башни столь велико, что не даст нормально работать кумулятивной струе.

So far there hasn't been a case where air defenses, Russian made or otherwise, has succeeded in halting the operation of drones. Drones do get shot down and significantly more often than most fixed-wing aircraft. But they have remained very comfortably in the green, the value of what they kill far exceeds the value of the drones lost. They have proven especially good at hitting evasive high-value targets which evade conventional air strikes like transporter erector launchers. Even non-state groups like the Houthis have been able to sustain drone operations against strong air defenses.

That's because writing about royals is fun. Writing about dysfunctional royals is doubly fun because you get to make them screwed up and get into the funni royal intrigue side of things, which is always fun--sadly, I mainly focus on the dysfunctional part and largely ignore the intrigue because character writing and storytelling are my jam.

speaking of fucked-up characters, is "characters just given a mental disorder to act as a character flaw because the writer can't be bothered to develop out actual character flaws or because they want you to sympathize with them more regardless of their shitty actions" a cliché yet? because I see it way too often.

Afford them: well that's a complicated matter but Laka is actually relatively rich nation, mainly profiteering off scientific research and manufacturing etc. I also mistyped- we have not a population of 2,8 million, but rather 28 million- extremely sorry the finals are breaking me down. Also the fleet carrier is essentially a restored "second-hand" Gerald-Ford-ish class.
How do you man them: again, with Laka being a PMT nation, manning these ships is not much of a problem.
gdp- not so sure, I am currently in the process of rewriting my economy but somewhat near Saudi Arabia...
How do yo have colonies: well, post WW3 (in which Laka did not participate but rather magaed to remain relatively neutral) world presents a lot of opportunities especially if your state was able to survive and save most of the manufacturing industry

Through terror and general suppressive policies of course! Laka is an extremely un-empathetic state with the general populace having completely no problem with this stuff.
Again, post WW3 world, lots of opportunities.

I don't say that drones suck all the time. They are extremely useful when the enemy is lacking a well manned, organized and equipped AA and Air Force which was the case in Armenia- they were extremely incompetent and disorganized. Hell, they even bought our jets but didn't bought missiles for them!

Even more on the topic of insane characters...

I have a character whose home city (Parreetown) got wiped off the face of the map when he was a young adult and was forced to flee to another continent, then they're chosen as Emperor of a Brazilian Nation i have for almost no reason other than "we think you're good" (aka sortition) and then is infected by two extremely powerful diseases that give him immortality (it's not like elves don't already have this anyway) and flight in exchange for sanity, both of which activate depending on how sane or insane he is. And then said Brazilian kingdom gets colonized by Europeans sending the poor guy further down the hellhole of extreme mental instability. Wack.

His name's Luciano Floreise or Emperor Morais V. You can find art on him in the "Art" tag on my sig.

The Odd Mary - Gary Stue can be just as entertaining as the angst-filled Batmans. I mean my favorite DC Hero is actually Superman.

My main character, Akeldama, suffers from the mental trauma and problems from living multiple millennia. She's come to coping methods but the pain and such is all there. She also doesn't have endless memory so her memory of the far past is constantly fading each day.

Smh id write a complete jackass too but the dissonance between me irl and my character would be too much rip.

Hehe I've sort of gone for a dichotomy, my main characters that I write are the Imperials, who on one hand are generally "good" people in private that are at the top of a genocidal colonial empire exploiting serfs...ye...

My main character, Akeldama, suffers from the mental trauma and problems from living multiple millennia. She's come to coping methods but the pain and such is all there. She also doesn't have endless memory so her memory of the far past is constantly fading each day.

Akel forgetting another husband every year 🤔

Hey I'm writing a country that genocides my IRL ethnicity, never too much dissonance oh that's another cliché: edgy genocide just for being edgy, no narrative purpose or central theme behind why you're including this in the story. This irks me a bit more so than other things because subjects like these really need to be treated with the respect they deserve if you choose to include them in your writing
