Quite the difference in how I handle writing. I'm actually not one for detail at all and tend to overlook number crunching, mainly because computation for the sake of realism makes me snooze.

Hahaha. In the Solar Remnant I zig-zag around reading about Operation Downfall to guesstimate Japanese and American casualties and make a deep social history about how this will affect Japanese Americans and put a dent on the future Civil Rights Movement...while writing about zany James Bond-like plots to accumulate gold in the Oceans to tank the Bretton Woods System and I follow the antics of a mad Alchemist who made catgirl slaves for the IJA (a possible origin story) but then turned them into pirates in the Bonin Islands after Japan fell.

I mean I wrote magic. Kinda? It's more like occultism. Only thing is, the magic doesn't actually work. You just end up with a bunch of runes scribbled all over the walls that don't actually do anything, despite them being claimed by many American Esotericists to hold magical properties.

For Tohorin I plan on putting the gods on the Notable People page and have them interact with world leaders, but I'll leave it ambiguous whether they form part of a collective people's imagination or if they and the myth-history they're in actually objectively exist.

hey i actually like doing that (like seriously when i was in school, i'd legit read my textbooks for fun. except the math ones, there's nothing fun in those.)

but like you know i'd rather read detailed information about nations that actually exist(ed), i mean if it's your thing to put a hella ton of detail in your nation, that's fine, but it just ain't anything i'm interested in reading about

It's been a while since I posted on F7, but one cliché is low effort posting in AL/AN threads.

A more specific sub-trope of this that I've noticed for a while is "what inspired your nation" in the "ask AU a question" thread. It's the most generic and thoughtless question there is and requires no engagement whatsoever with the content of the person you're asking it to, and probably makes up half the posts in that thread at this point. Funnily enough I don't think I've ever gotten that one myself, but I can't help but feel bad for KG, for instance, when they're asked the same question for the 15th time and keep linking back to the same post answering it over and over again.

>tfw you actually have to make a copy-paste for a single question in an f7 thread

Yeah, I try to make more high-effort questions there but it does become hard after a while, since I was never all that sure about how kosher questions about IC matters in that thread were and thus tried to shy away from them. I'd also say it's part of the broader problem of people not caring to really engage with others' works at all. I understand that some people don't really have time to read in-depth or really get to know other users to the point they can personalize their responses to a great degree but even I've noticed in the seven or so months I've been here that there's been a trend towards the downhill in terms of effort being put into replies - though thankfully I think with lots of older posters becoming more active it's gotten better recently.

In some fairness, it's hard not to wonder. Completely original nomadic people with its own religion and conlang? Magical socialist paradise? Esoteric post-apocalyptic America? I find myself constantly curious about where people got their inspiration!

It took asking a few times and getting asked a few times for me to realize, though, that the answer often boils down to a variant "not sure, I just really liked the idea?" So now I try to avoid asking that question, and if I do ask it, I pair it with a more creative question.

Whippersnappers! F7 was better in the old days! When half the threads were just CLT threads! And there were tons of non-NS RPs in it because P2TM didn't exist yet! And there were lots more game threads that didn't involve reacting to stuff about the player's nation! And no one cared about 'double posting'!

Fun fact: Valentine Z also utilises one of the SCPs as a crossover thing, not that we have their weapons and all, but one of them is "The Architect". We used it sparingly to make more space when it gets cramped. ^^

Also, also, not pointing fingers at anyone, but I would love to see SCPs used in some other way. Come on, there are more things than just your commonly known Keters and Eudids. I personally love that Pizza Box, which does nothing but to give you free pizza based on you as a person. Yum!

Ahh! I don't think I've interacted with her as your character here on this forum, but I've read that SCP entry. I'd nearly forgotten it, but as soon as I saw the image it all came flooding back. Hoogh, I know there's a lot of creepy and spooky stuff in the SCP Foundation, but daggum, the girl with void eyes is the one that's scariest to me.
