Because automatization and hypermilitarization. Also the main purpose of having two carriers is for terrorizing the colonies when they rebell.

Why need aircraft carriers to patrol overseas when you can get private military companies to do that for you?

PMCs are all good and well until they start charging you exorbitant prices and even then, 80% chance that you will definitely get the guys and girls of the PMC to turn tail on you just because money was better elsewhere.

That, and regardless of how secure and classified the information can be, I as a nation would not want everyone to find out that I have using PMCs to deal with more troublesome matters in the most unethical of ways.

Which I know quite a handful about thanks to the fact that the topic of Venice has been drilled into my head in the days of SS (Social Studies, not the... you know, the other thing) in 2012 O Levels.

That, I didn't know, truth be told, though it seems obvious now that I read it. With that said, ehh... I don't know, what if they get away before you know of their schemes and stuff. And even for PMCs, executing them after using them just feels like poor form. 🤔

Huh, so there are other ways to project your country's power overseas. and having a PMC to do that is the very last thing you want to do.

So PMCs are off the table, a country can use drones, like, killer drones. Lots of them.

Yes because a singular example surely can outweigh dozens of drones shot down by our nation in Syria.

You do understand that simply building drones is not a solution to a guerilla problem, especially when both you and the guerillas have acces to powerful EMP weaponry? Sure, drones can be fitted to resist EMP's but you have to agree that they severely lower the effectiveness of UAV

WW2 examples don't work in modern combat mainly because modern planes cost FAR MORE relatively to ships than what they did in WW2. Also VT shells.
