She will personally hunt down whoever did this and will probably try to duel the offender. To death if she feels like it.

There are three things that can happen to you if that:

1. If caught by an officer of the law or similar, they will charged you with simple vandalism or a serious felony. And notify the owner(s) of say vehicle. If found guilty under a court, will add a fine for the amount of damage caused, which will pay for repairs.
2. If caught by the owner, best a bloody nose, worse broken legs. Then say owner will call the police to deal with situation. With the result being the same as above, adding assault if the owner feels so.
3. If the owner is someone of a gang or crime syndicate background. Either the offender is found in ditch, countryside, or river. With deaths varying from gunshots to stab wounds.

Depends on the type of cybercrime. Our internet is state filtered and monitored, so any form of governmental leaking/hacking can be punishable up to 50 years in prison and giant fines or even death in the case of a severe cyberattack on any government site/database.

Depends on how many you stole. For the sake of what you're saying, so like one pack, if the person has proof, it counts as a possible misdemeanor, which could wind up with a 50 dollar fine, or a day in jail.

As a monarchy, 'insane monarchists' are known merely as 'average citizens' in Velosia. Unfortunately chemical weapons are illegal under Velosian law and you will be sentenced to life imprisonment for egregious violation of the rules of war. Apologies.

Howd we even get the nukes? It's also unclear what is meant by a "capitol city"; any of the enemy's cities that has a capitol building, or said enemy's capital city?

At any rate, you're definitely looking at a life sentence, since you did so without permission.
