"I... I... I have seen it. I have seen the horror in the stars. It is unimaginably vast, a whale trawling through the cosmos, brushing aside our meager attempts to scratch and poke at it like they are nothing. If it wants to end us it will. There is nothing we can do to stop it. It does not even know we exist and it could end us. There is nothing in this world that can stop it. There is nothing in this universe that can stop it. We can only pray that we are not caught up in the wake of its passing."

"Ari. Nice simple name. Like my old name. I can appreciate the warrior spirit and devotion to loyalty you Ghesites possess, in some ways similar to the Tohorinese before the arrival. You are very much correct in your assessment over how foreign ideals can change the course of entire civilizations, but in an interconnected world, it is something that is bound to happen. One little bit of advice though: achieving glorious death in battle may be an ideal in on itself, but inflicting death on enemies is far more important in this world."

"Working on an Arctic fish vessel? Yeah, makes sense for your location. Some of us there would want to visit Arctic at some point. It seems that patriotism runs deep in your family, and that's commendable. He got pretty far in Airforce, but got discharged after an accident broke his leg? Knowing politics, some probably are sad that it didn't kill him."

"Now for the political stuffs - it seems that the damned virus has struck your country as well, and is just as big of a concern. Hell, it brought away some of our attention from Aral Sea. While the approach so far from him has been pretty sound, we wouldn't really try to form deeper ties with Russia or go for that vaccine, because if history's anything to remember, then it is the fact that Russia shouldn't be trusted too much. It seems that he wants to give a bit more power to queen when it comes to diplomacy - gonna be honest, it feels a bit surreal to see a post-soviet monarchy, considering that none became one after USSR's collapse in our timeline. At least he doesn't seem to be a particularly predatory capitalist, is a conservative, and has some sound economical views. His religiousness might be an obstacle, though - we have a good reason to be wary of those who are religious, Hizb ut-Tahrir is a proof of that."

"Overall, our opinion could be summed up as cautious, as he isn't too hateable, yet not someone we would want to commend, if that makes sense."

Oh boy. These guys, let me tell you about these guys.

They're nationalists, through and through. If the Young Turks ever met these guys, they'd be denounced as liberal communists. Sure, they say they're Social Democrats - not that those guys are any better - but man. Just look at this stuff! It's honestly impressive, the amount of dedication they have for their little imagined community. I applaud it. Lazily, and with a snarky look on my face, but I applaud it. They seem to genuinely want the best for their corner of the world, even if that 'want' can border with fantastical dreams at times.

They still suck though. For all they go on about 'national unity', they sure love to exclude anyone who they deem not to be truly Karakalpak. I guess that's the shtick of nationalism, even when it's 'revolutionary nationalism'. Lame. They've butchered the name of revolutionaries everywhere.

"A woman of her time," the President shrugs, "with ideas that are pretty much in line with world leaders of the sixties. Uh, the last one. It's hard to get worked up over century-old events, but I can say I don't particularly like nuclearization. Weapon nuclearization specifically. Again though... 1960s. We don't have a stellar track record either, and there are good points too." President Washington clears her throat, unravelling a piece of paper with a bulleted list.

"Civil nuclearization I'm all for, that's got to be one of the single greatest accomplishments of the 1960s. Even a century out it's still the logical choice. Trade pacts are also good, India is a pretty good country to trade with. Paranoid, but... you know the drill. Thoroughly a product of her time, but also kinda fair for her day as well."

Folding it back in, she nods approval, if just through the lens of historicity with the added benefit of the 1960s being one living generation removed from her.

On Montse:

"Thank you for your kind words, Baroness. I would like to amend your statement on myself, though. I know that we are bound to change over time, but I fear we will change in a way that we lose hold of what makes us children of Ghes. Foreign life holds so many simple appeals that it looks like... perfection. Riches, wealth, all the desires of the heart are there for the taking. But it lacks a heart, I feel, compared to our own style of life. It is like a choke-weed- it outmodes that which is different from itself, and when it takes root it dominates everything it touches. But it is not necessarily more beautiful than that it replaces. I would like to make sure the beauty of my own people is not choked out by others. Your own culture understands this, I feel. And I will not die until the Mother wills it, that you can be assured of."

On Bailey:

"I find it strange that taxation holds such priority in the President's mind. I have not had to deal with such things. More often it is the opposite- I have to convince the Council that their continued relationship with myself will bring them wealth, and not the other way around. It is an exhausting existence. I can only imagine wrangling wealth out of one's subjects is even more so. I can already feel the headache such a thing must cause. I need some water."

"What a pair of useless harlots. Their record is filled with nonsense about divinity and magical stones, and is devoid of any actual useful information. Am I supposed to be impressed by their godhood or battle prowess? Are I intended to marvel at their countless victories and indomitable strength? If these two are supposed to be deities, then they are rather disappointing. For what is it they've accomplished with their otherworldly powers? Aid some primitive creatures in an irrelevant war? Quite mediocre. I am no god, I have not been infused with any divine powers, yet I have accomplished far more impressive feats than these two. It perplexes me why such vapid beings are the ones whom supposedly hold godlike power. If only divinity were granted to those who actually deserve it."

"Lord Terenbith. I like that name, it shows an authoritative and meaningful tone which represents your character. Your personality, your leadership, your political views. It's not that degenerate. You know, I would consider you acceptable if you weren't an undesirable non ethnic Dulochian. Your ethnicity is of degeneracy and I would still gladly slaughter and enslave everyone of your race, but you seem to be someone worthy of my respect. Still I consider you heretic as you don't adhere to my faith or Ideology, but it's better than all those unholy subhuman heathens mooching off the world by their existence. Unfortunately, the non traditional way you got into power through drugs and other degenerate actions is not something I support. Drugs are for heretics who deserve to be burned alive. When you are born into a social class, that is where you remain for life- if you are born a slave, then you do not deserve freedom. Only nobility and the royalty deserves position in power, not a serf from a humble background. Your policy when it comes to slavery is very agreeable, as we can both agree that economic exploitation is necessary for success. You could be a little more identitarian and ethnochauvinist, but either way your race is not desirable and is degenerate. Still, you are an entity worthy of some respect, even if your inevitable ethnic undesirability goes in the way."

" Feodora is an intriguing character, just like her husband. I do not particularly approve of her rather authoritarian tendencies, but then again, firm decisions and autocratic systems do tend to be more efficient than democracies. She seems to be a rather secretive woman, espousing fashion which is almost a century old.

I do admire the fact that she has served in the military ; I know very few women of such status who have served their nation. I also commend her for her belief, and encouragement of technology and scientific advancement, for it is the way of the future. To conclude, as they say, behind every successful man, there is a woman. Behind Kazimir's legacy, there is Feodora. "

A true Modern Kingdom. It's what I'm leading my people towards. Hopefully, if we can prove steadfast and resilient enough, we may build our economy to match our allies like them in strength. May the Eternal Blue Flame light the path.

"There appears to be no information available about Synvia's leader. I can't really form an opinion based on nothing, can I?"

"As for Christophe, I believe our commendation for him has already been documented. In light of recent news, we would like to give him a formal appraisal and another round of applause for his victory in the Second Carthaginian War. Very well done, sir."

"The sisters are an unsettling pair. That they conceal themselves from the public and use automaton puppets to represent them is proof enough of that. I cannot accuse them of cowardice, for they went to war, albeit shielded by some manner of Sabilline. Both are easily riled. Their politics are beyond me, save mention of nationalism. That is an ideal I can support. But beyond that, I can say little save that in my situation, those flowers in their eyes would wither and wilt, and that their enigmatic ways are too inscrutable and unnatural for me to endorse earnestly."

The Statement on Alton

"So, he's the captain who has led the settlers successfully in a world which appears to be frostpunk, according to the zoomer members of youth wing. Perhaps he is pragmatic and has integrity, indeed, but from that picture we doubt that he has as much of compassion - he looks rather angry and ready to beat someone down. A lot of bad things they do are understandable because they are located in a hellish environment, and the shift order seems to be pretty okay. That said, in some parts his bio feels way too pompous, and it seems that a lot more sinister side is hiding behind him, and the skeletons in his closet are just waiting to be released. Sure, we have a lot of shady stuff as well, but we don't fear being confronted by it."

"Once again, the list of obligations doesn't seem to be too bad on its own, but judging in context we can assume that some of it has an ambiguous meaning. But hey, he leads a group of people who have to struggle for a living in frozen wasteland, so we are better going to leave him to his own. As a final note - he seems to have almost no other political allegiances otherwise."
