The region known as Dawnland (comprising of states in the former Northeast US and provinces in Eastern Canada) is named after what many natives called the region.

I don't think I've ever said anything about population density. I rather specifically avoid using numbers in my factbooks.

They're an Islamic state slapped right into the middle of India. From what I can tell, they were essentially a Princely State of the British Raj from around the fall of the Mughals until 1948, when the Fascists took over a now independent India (though I don't know why Fascism is popular given WWII seems to have happened). Of course, the Deccani didn't like India too much, so in 2024 they told them to piss off. Their majority religion is Islam, which puzzles me given that Hinduism is the dominant religion in the subcontinent outside Bangladesh and Pakistan even before the partition, but I won't question its possibility. Their Sultan is 19 at this point in real life, but their canon seems to be happening in 2056; then again, he began his reign at a pretty young (but not uncommon) age as a revolutionary leader.

They maintain permanent settlements in 469 planets and have a total human population of around 473.5. Which means roughly one billion person per planet. Which is insane in and of itself, but significantly small when you consider they've been a spacefaring Empire for around 3 centuries now.

The Sildorians were originally a planetary civilization that relied on hunting and gathering for most of its history. The species was unified by the Clique of Utaris 2nd century B.U.E (Presumably Before Unification Era?). From there, the Empire continued expanding its domain across the Sila system through the discovery and invention of Hyperlane and Hyperdrive respectively.
