"I have known for much too long the stress of ruling a nation. When everything falls upon your hands, and every decision is yours to make, things rapidly take their toll. I cannot claim to be the kind of leader my nation needed when my time came. Neither can he. Charles von Roland is one of the monarchs Aozora used to castigate with all her fury. The kind who throw away their power in exchange for providing their people with freedom. She hated such people because she saw them as weak and craven and foolish. I do not share all of her views- not in the wake of...everything that's happened. But I agree with her on that much. Charles is the kind of leader who feels a burden too heavy for his shoulders to bear, and so deliver that burden to the people in the name of supposed liberty. I have a hard time believing that is the entire story. If he wanted his people to have full control he would give it to them. No, he retains his power, and he retains that stress and that burden all the while claiming to be a leader of the free world. That he was an effective military commander, as I've come to realise, does not make him an effective head of state. His role is not that of a tyrant, ruling and overseeing the country with authority and dignity. Nor is it the role of a president, serving the will of the common masses and twisting it to fit his own ends. He is a mediator and arbiter. The one who holds the rope that binds the cogs of the machine, but not the one who pulls them forward. I do not hate all he has done. But I see him as someone who will always be troubled by control- whether lacking it or desiring it. Either he will let those cogs turn on their own, or he should drag the chain and pull them himself. This middle ground is unhealthy in my eyes. But perhaps I still have my own lessons to learn about governance."

to become a leader, yet you had both thrust upon you. I can understand how it feels to see your nation coming undone by internal turmoil even if mines ended and the effects it left behind didn't result in my nation fragmenting. Instead I lost someone close to me. But I also see in you a strong person who endures what life has thrown at you and manages with the best to your ability. Your belief of doing what must be done regardless of the cost is something I can admire. I can see a bit of myself in you, almost like what i could have been if I stayed in the military. But while we share the same belief in having our people united to stand against any threats I can not say I agree with your endorsement of a military dictatorship. A strong leader is required for any state to function and survive but if one denies the people their voices and their sense of participation in managing the state than they will begin to feel restless and they will question their loyalty to the state. I can understand that in your current predicament you must go with that system. But when the time comes that your nation is whole once more I do hope you will change your governance before another revolution occurs."

"It appears that the timeless dichotomy between regression and progress greatly afflicts Auraroe Ashwood. From my understanding, she attempts to maintain her nation's ancient traditions while also implementing modernizing reforms. Unfortunately, in such a divisive dichotomy as between regression and progress, there can be no compromise. A leader must choose one path, either to choose ignorance and abide by useless traditions, or instead embrace progress and create a better future for their people. Ashwood's futile attempts to selectively reform an obsolete system will yield no results, instead it will only give her subjects but a taste of progress. Such a taste, no matter how insignificant, can prove dangerous to decadent regimes like the one in Airceltria, for citizens deprived of the freedoms instilled by progress might well try to overthrow their current leadership in order to make actual meaningful reforms for themselves. I find the Auraroe to be well-intentioned, as she seeks to reform her nation and bring it into the modern age. Yet she goes about doing such in a wrong, admittedly foolish way. She, at least mentally, is still the young girl carelessly playing in the woods, innocent and naïve, completely removed from the harsh realities of life. Her ceremonial military career certainly did not have maturing effect upon her psyche, nor did the civil war which marred her childhood, it seems. Such is a negative byproduct of archaic monarchical systems, as their rulers are too sheltered and privileged to know the real world in which their subjects are forced to toil everyday in. Undecided on whether or not to embrace progress, so too is the Auraroe hesitant to make known her stance on religious and reproductive rights, among other topics. Such further illustrates her guileless character, and unfortunately, her ineptitude as a ruler. How can she take charge and lead her people is even she is unsure of where she stands politically? These are not the markings of a strong and capable leader, I'm afraid. If the Auraroe continues her misguided rule, it is probable that the Airceltrian people will tire of their indecisive monarch, with them seeking to remove her from power in order to make the much-needed reforms which she is too timid to make herself."

I'm now dealing with backward savages? Is that what this has come down to? They aren't even in the same era as us! Oh well, let's get this over with.

Ari's bravery is commendable. Really, it is. She's dedicated. She's loyal. She comes from a simpler age, where iron ran in the blood of warriors, and laws emerged from nature, not from paper. Of course, this is her most fatal flaw. Men are bound by their interests, not by any warrior code. When she places her faith in the wrong subordinate, she will find a knife in her back. Which is a shame, really. She represents the last bastion of noble warrior spirit in the face of the encroaching tides of the next era, the rigid dullness of the Berghi Empire. Her struggle is futile; but her spirit is admirable.

Asserting that failure is above all things unacceptable can lead to rather harmful practices of cover-ups or resources wasted on fronts not worth fighting over. As for her being a psychic and of such power is fascinating to me. In another life I could see her being made Auaroe quiet easily, she has the power for it, though perhaps not the temperament. Well I can say that by her personality I like her already, the spunky types were always my favorite, fuhuhuhu. But beyond that I did wonder how my life would have been if I stayed in the military and from seeing what Marut is like I guess she is close to what my life would have been like if I had stayed. I don't condone profiting off war or piracy as much as her, but sleeping in is something we both can agree on.

As for her being a psychic and of such power is fascinating to me. In another life I could see her being made Auaroe quiet easily, she has the power for it, though perhaps not the temperament. I see great potential in her, both as a leader and a master of esoteric forces. Just a shame rather be a warrior first before anything else.

"funny" things, but had you ever considered just to imagine, how life could be if you'd find someone to love. Someone, that would belong solely to you, and vice versa. Like, I realize that you really want to satisfy your sexual needs and everything, but... Does it really takes this much? Do you really need a literal harem? You oughta do something about your life..."

"I actually admire Sven a lot. He's not that much older than me and he's already accomplished so much. Sometimes I feel so stressed and pressured when running Babalabuska, like i'm not doing a good job. But seeing others like me do things that no one has done before makes me want to accomplish things that I didn't know was possible. Maybe I'll just blow up the sun. That'll teach it for giving me a sunburn once." - Cheems
